

ty of California
ern Regional ary Facility

Ex Libris

C. K. OGDEN

~~DDT~~

25 E Hawkesbury

1899

MANY MEMORIES OF MANY PEOPLE

DD 1

Hawkesbury

MANY MEMORIES OF MANY PEOPLE

BY :

M. C. M. SIMPSON

AUTHOR OF "LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF JULIUS AND MARY MOHL," "REMINISCENCES OF A REGICIDE," ETC.

EDWARD ARNOLD
37, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON
1898

TO MY GRANDCHILDREN.

THE last seventy years have been so full of progress and discovery that we old people cannot help feeling an ardent desire to know what wonders the next seventy have in store for those fortunate beings, like you, my dear children, whose privilege I trust it will be to live through them. I hope, however, that your eyes will not be so dazzled by the brilliancy of the future as to render them incapable of casting a glance on the past. It is most likely personified for you in me as the future is to me in you; and I think that the following sketches of a world that has changed so much will interest you all the more because they are dedicated to you and written by your loving old grandmother.

P R E F A C E.

THE destruction of my old home in Hyde Park Gate induced me to write down some recollections of the society once gathered within its walls. A small part of these memoranda appeared in the New Review in the spring of 1893. I was asked by many of those whose attention they attracted to expand them into a book, and the following pages are the result.

The many distinguished people whom I had the happiness of knowing naturally group themselves round the central figure of my father, and in most cases, as they were his contemporaries, disappeared with him. Others, however, whom he knew in his later years, were spared to us for some time longer, as will be seen towards the end of this book.

I have omitted almost all mention of the friends of a still more recent date. The present generation needs no reminder of them ; but I am glad of this opportunity for expressing my gratitude for their kindness to me and mine.

M. C. M. SIMPSON.

MILLMEAD HOUSE,
GUILDFORD,
November 22.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

EARLY DAYS.

	PAGE
Kensington Road—Half-way House—Gore House—Kensington Gardens—Princess Victoria—Kensington Square—Cobbett—Talleyrand—Mill—Lawrence—Wilkie—Callcott—13, Hyde Park Gate—Turnpike—Mail-coaches—Our garden—The Stephens—Lucy Austin—Sir Herbert Edwardes—Malthus—Blanco White	I

CHAPTER II.

EARLY FRIENDS.

Archbishop Whately—Love for children and gardening—Regardless of appearances—Resemblance to Dr. Johnson—Irish schoolbooks—Aphorisms—Riddles—Delight in Miss Austen—A point of casuistry—Fairy-tale—Sydney Smith—Coombe Florey—Poor Law Commission—Lord Chancellor Sugden—His life as Attorney-General—Speech at ninety—Lunatic asylum—Coronation—Queen announcing her marriage—Opening of Parliament—Addition to house—King Joseph—Afternoon tea—Rotten Row—Lord Lansdowne—Concerts at Lansdowne House—Poet Moore—Blue coats and brass buttons—'Partant pour la Syrie'—Bowood—Miss Edgeworth—The cat's-meat man—French chef	II
---	----

CHAPTER III.

SOME FOREIGN FRIENDS.

	PAGE
Brussels—The Arconatis—Gaesbeck—Quêtelet—King Leopold compared with Prince Albert—Carlsbad—Polish friends—Posting in Germany—Dresden—The Noels—Castle of Wildenfels—Curious manners—Dress of peasants—Switzerland—Mont Cénis—Turin—Camille Cavour—Villeggiatura—Genoa—Scientific congress—Splendid fêtes and beautiful women—Bulwer—Rain in the Alps—Stopped by procession at Cortina—Venice—Grand fêtes—Play at Vicenza—Distinguished visitors—Duchess of Angoulême—Marshal Marmont—Thunder and lightning—Turin revisited in 1850—Genoa and Florence—Mme. Lajatico—Villa Trollope—Naples and Sorrento—Tocqueville and Ampère—Rome—Duke of Sermoneta—Last visit to Italy	32

CHAPTER IV.

FRIENDS IN PARIS.

Last days of the monarchy—George Summers—The Austins—Faucher—Guizot—Says—Tocquevilles—Plays and operas—Rachel—Journal in May, 1848—Wolowski—Lamartine—His beauty, poverty, and lavish expenditure—Alexis de Tocqueville—First acquaintance—Tocquevilles at Sorrento—The Quai d'Orsay—'Ancien Régime'—Reception in England—Meets us at the Hôtel Bedford—Mme. de Tocqueville—Visit to her in 1861—The Beaumonts—Château de Tocqueville—Ampère's admirable reading—His devotion to Mme. Récamier and Chateaubriand, and to the Chevreux—Guizot—Exile—Death of his mother—Red Spectre—Tocqueville's appreciation of Guizot—Val Richer—Families in the same house—Walks in the lanes—Guizot's orders—Spanish marriages—Family sorrows—Power of work at eighty-seven—A sincere Christian	50
---	----

CHAPTER V.

THREE DISTINGUISHED LADIES.

	PAGE
Mrs. Grote—Likeness to Queen Elizabeth—Personal appearance and dress—Piquant conversation—Mendelssohn—Jenny Lind—The 'Elijah'—Drive in the Park and Bond Street—Burnham Beeches—History Hut—Versatility—Long Bennington—Historian dislikes farming—Concerts at Savile Row—Whist—Strong language—'Ma chère mère'—Letters on French politics—Another on Poor Law adepts—Relations with foreign statesmen—Shere—Admiration of her husband—His gentleness and courtesy—Trim, old-fashioned dress—'Case of the Rich against the Poor'—Sympathy—Names for her friends—Self-sacrifice—Charlotte Brontë—Self-confidence—A valentine—Jenny Lind—Her perfect naturalness—Engagement to Mr. Harris—Finally broken off—Farewell performances—Paris—Marriage—Settles in England—Concert for the Prince of Sweden—Windspoint—Manuel Garcia—Mrs. Nassau Senior—Her portrait by Watts—Her singing—Friendships with distinguished artists—Elm House—Love for children—Helps Miss Stanley in the Crimean War—Appointed Inspector to report on the female department in schools and workhouses—Her social talents—Serious illness and death—Verses from the Spectator - - - -	73

CHAPTER VI.

LONDON IN THE FIFTIES.

Exhibition of 1851—Death and funeral of the Duke of Wellington—Crimean War—Sir Colin Campbell—The White House—Kent House—The Villiers—Thackeray—His daughters—Amateur pantomime—Senior's review of 'Vanity Fair'—Diversions with the Thackerays—Devotion of the novelist to his womankind—Sudden death—Mrs. Leslie Stephen—The poet Rogers—Breakfast parties—Sir Charles and Lady Eastlake—Charles Babbage—His parties—Hallam—Abraham Hayward—Mr. Fleming—Lady

	PAGE
Chantrey—Mr. and Mrs. Austin—Chartist demonstration —Lady William Russell—Her distinguished sons—Mme. de Peyronnet—Mrs. Gaskell—Mrs. Procter—Lady Bell	102

CHAPTER VII.

COUNTRY HOUSES.

Visit to Ireland—Buncrana Castle—Mr. Hastings—Mr. Bate- son—His murder—The Milmans— The Club —Fazio— The Hampdens, Ewelme — Oxford — Hereford — The Archer Clives—Malvern—The Carlyles—Lord Lansdowne —‘Pigeon’ Paley—The Fords—The Lewis’—Harpton —English Prime Ministers — Palmerston — Gladstone — Russell—Broadlands—Visit to Edward Ellice—Glenquoich —Dunrobin—Stirling of Keir—Lord Chancellor Campbell —Dr. Jeune at Pembroke—President Routh	122
---	-----

CHAPTER VIII.

CONVERSATIONS IN WALES, LONDON, AND SCOTLAND— 1852, 1855, AND 1856.

Unpublished journals of N. W. Senior—State of politics in 1852 — Conversations with Sir Frankland and George Cornwall Lewis—Prospects of the Ministry—State of the Foreign Office—Ties of a member to his constituents— The Welsh language should be discouraged — Rebecca rioters—Journal in 1855—Mismanagement of Crimean War — Tocqueville’s letter — Lord John’s resignation — Lord Lansdowne on the Ministry—Palmerston—Sidney Herbert —Difficulty of finding good commanders—Incompetence of officers at this period—Lord John indispensable—Maro- chetti on the Italian Alliance—The French and English armies ought to have been under one commander— Letter from Massimo d’Azeglio—Lord John’s defence— Extension of the franchise probable—Lord Derby fails to construct a Cabinet—No school for politicians—Lord John cannot form a Government—Gladstone and Disraeli— Speeches in the House—Unwise forbearance of aristocratic Ministers — Dr. Jeune and the Oxford Commission —

	PAGE
Promptitude and decision of Louis Napoleon—The Crédit Foncier —Battle of the Alma—Lord Raglan's declining health—Position of Spain—Palmerston Premier—Lord Lansdowne—Lord Monteagle on the situation—Position of Lord John—Lord Rosse on the war—Scott Russell is building an iron-clad—Mismanagement in the Crimea—Tocqueville's letter—English aristocracy knows not how to govern—Senior disagrees—Evils of a democracy in time of war—Lowe and Layard—Lord John Russell—Defection of Peelites—Overstone and Strelecki—Lord Raglan did not believe in the war—Sir John MacNiel—Red-tapeism at Balaklava—Lord Lansdowne—Defence of Lord Raglan—Louis Napoleon and Prince Napoleon—Lord John's mission—Weakness of Austrian army—Obstinacy of Emperor Nicholas—Our army insufficient—Lord Grey—Democracy trains no statesmen—Van de Weyer—Continental Ministers rejoice over England's failure—All Europe surprised by the war—Queen Victoria—English army must be increased—Mr. Grote disapproves of Ministers—Democratic boroughs will not elect good men—Dissatisfaction of Edward Ellice—Ministers should have resigned—Lord Derby—Lord John Russell—Lord Palmerston—Duke of Newcastle—Lewis Chancellor of the Exchequer—Senior leaves London	138

CHAPTER IX.

JOURNAL IN 1855 CONTINUED—JOURNAL IN 1856.

Death of Nicholas—Lord John Russell's mission—Austrian propositions—Palmerston and Lord John—Comments of Hayter, Lord Monteagle, and George Cornwall Lewis—Austrian propositions not refused by us—Lord Aberdeen—Lord Cowley's story—Vaillant, Louis Napoleon, and Drouyn de Lhuys—Rémusat's opinion—Resignation of Lord John—Delane's account—Sir Charles Wood—Superiority of our navy to our army—Functions of Government—Lord Lansdowne on Lord John—Louis Napoleon rejected the Austrian propositions—Gladstone—Van de Weyer on the Austrian negotiations—Lewis on Lord John,

Graham, and Gladstone—Journal in 1856—Lord Aberdeen on Pitt—Wilberforce—Peel—Wellington—Grey—The Queen—Prince Albert—Views of a High Church M.P.—Gladstone—Archdeacon Denison—Georges III. and IV. and William IV.—Bright—The French alliance—Palmerston—Maynooth—Parliamentary papers—House of Commons—Journalism a road to office—Bright on the Austrian propositions—Lord Stratford—War was unnecessary—French are triumphant—They covet Savoy—Louis Napoleon's reason for courting the Pope—Bright on Malta and Gibraltar—Lord George Bentinck—Olmütz negotiations—The war has strengthened the war party in France—Louis Napoleon ready to attack us—War costs nothing to a despot—Progress of democracy in England—Social habits—The Kirk—Objection to unwritten prayers—Walter Scott—Bright's political system—Universal Suffrage—He prefers Household Suffrage—Parliaments should last only two years—Restrictions on the Crown—Church separated from State—Primogeniture—Heavy income-tax—Lord Aberdeen's comments—Bishops the poorest men in England—Bright furious against the interference of the Factory Acts—Lord Aberdeen on Molesworth and Lord John—Durham letter—Disapproved by Lord Aberdeen—Thiers could not understand the Duke of Wellington—End of Mr. Senior's journal	212
--	-----

CHAPTER X.

LATER FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

Education Commission—Duke of Newcastle—Rev. W. Rogers—Hallam—Miss Carpenter—Monckton Milnes—Henry Reeve—The Merivales—Cardinal Manning—Rev. W. Brookfield—George Stovin Venables—Sir Edward Bunbury—James Spedding—Matthew Arnold—Kingleake—Richard Doyle—Sir James Lacaita—Count Strelecki—Sir Charles Newton—Lowell—Dr. de Mussy—American friends—Dean Stanley—Lady Augusta—Order of the Bath—Père Hyacinthe—Archdeacon Denison—Bishop Thirlwall's birthday—Death of Lady Augusta—Mrs. Craven—Stanley's handwriting—Canterbury—Canon Robertson	267
--	-----

CHAPTER XI.

LATER FRIENDS IN PARIS.

	PAGE
Ball at the Tuileries—Prosper Mérimée—Yellow tea—Versailles—Victor Cousin—Dulwich Gallery—Michel Chevalier—Mignet—Prévost Paradol—Jules Simon—Circourt—Comtesse de Circourt—Paris the paradise of old ladies—Mme. Anisson—French evening parties—Montalembert—French preachers—Abbé Perreyve—The Sacré Cœur—Good Friday at Nôtre Dame—French country houses—Val Richer—The Kergorlays at Canisy—The Corcelles at Beau Fossé—Old houses in Paris—Pius IX.—French baby—Marquis de Chambrun—French marriages—Duvergier de Hauranne at Héry—Changarnier—Odillon Barrot—M. Forgues—M. Chambol—M. de Vogué—French farmers—September in Paris—Loménie—Château de Stors—Drouyn de Lhuys at Amblainvilliers—Cards in the vestibule—Circourts at Les Bruyères—Mme. Cornu—Her reconciliation with the Emperor—Ivan Tourguénieff—Renan—Ristori—Renan in London—At the Collège de France	- 291

CHAPTER XII.

LAST YEARS OF A HAPPY LIFE.

Our house resembled a country house—Exhibition of 1862—Polyglot assemblies—Hekekyan Bey—An Armenian lady—Trip to Ireland—The wild west—Mount Trenchard—‘The Colleen Bawn’—Killarney—Birr Castle—Lord and Lady Rosse—The telescopes—Mr. Trench at Cardtown—Mr. Home and spiritualism—Paris in 1863—Failing health of Mr. Senior—Howick—Ossington—Edward Denison—Death of many friends—Miss Thackeray’s account of the last days—All has passed away	- - - 320
--	-----------

As this Book is in great demand, it is respectfully requested that it may be returned to the Library as soon as read.

OPLE

CHAPTER I.

EARLY DAYS.

THE modern young lady who mounts her bicycle or climbs valiantly to the top of an omnibus on her way to attend the College of Music or the high classes in Kensington Square, or, if more frivolously disposed, to visit one of the grand shops in the High Street, has no idea what a different world she surveys from the one that would have met her view had she had the misfortune to be born in the previous generation, when bicycles were not and ladies did not travel in omnibuses. There were very few of these convenient vehicles at that time, and those few were filled with dirty straw and were otherwise repellent. Girls, indeed, never went abroad at all without an escort. If she wished to go to Kensington, a young lady of those days would probably have walked down Hyde Park followed by a tall footman in livery.

Albert Gate was a recent erection; the two huge mansions on either side stood alone and untenanted so long that they were called Gibraltar, because it

MANY MEMORIES OF MANY PEOPLE

CHAPTER I.

EARLY DAYS.

THE modern young lady who mounts her bicycle or climbs valiantly to the top of an omnibus on her way to attend the College of Music or the high classes in Kensington Square, or, if more frivolously disposed, to visit one of the grand shops in the High Street, has no idea what a different world she surveys from the one that would have met her view had she had the misfortune to be born in the previous generation, when bicycles were not and ladies did not travel in omnibuses. There were very few of these convenient vehicles at that time, and those few were filled with dirty straw and were otherwise repellent. Girls, indeed, never went abroad at all without an escort. If she wished to go to Kensington, a young lady of those days would probably have walked down Hyde Park followed by a tall footman in livery.

Albert Gate was a recent erection; the two huge mansions on either side stood alone and untenanted so long that they were called Gibraltar, because it seemed they never would be taken. A shabby old barrack occupied the site of the present building at Knightsbridge, and a little farther down stood a most picturesque old country inn, called the Halfway House, at which the market carts—huge waggons piled up with hay, fruit, and vegetables—used to stop to refresh man and beast on the way to Covent Garden.

There were many more large, country-looking houses, surrounded by gardens and shut in by high walls from the vulgar gaze, than are now left along the Kensington Road. Some have been pulled down to make way for commonplace squares and terraces, or hideous colossal flats.

One of these was Gore House, where Lady Blessington held her court. I remember often seeing Count d'Orsay in his cabriolet (then the fashionable young man's vehicle) holding the reins in his white-gloved hands, displaying an immense extent of cuff and shirtfront, his crisp curly hair waving in the breeze. A magnificent figure he made as he swept rapidly round the corners, his diminutive tiger bumping up and down on the footboard behind.

In 1851, when the Halfway House was pulled down, Gore House was turned into a restaurant by Soyer; the Albert Hall now stands in majestic respectability on its site, and the solemn strains of the organ have replaced the brilliant sallies of that amusing but unscrupulous circle. Someone is said to have remarked to Count d'Orsay of his wife :

'What a charming, pensive expression Lady Harriet has !'

'She owes that to me,' was the reply.

A high wall enclosed Kensington Gardens. The path all along it, running parallel with Hyde Park, was much more sheltered and secluded than it is now. It was lined with fine old trees, which have long since disappeared; I remember how I used to stumble over their roots. At the east lodge was a mound which we children used to behold with awe, for we were told that a little boy once broke his leg in trying to climb up it. In those very early days we often met Princess Victoria and her mother in the Gardens. She used to take great notice of my brother, whom she called her 'little favourite'; and I remember once our dogs, which we had taken to the Serpentine for a swim, shaking themselves over the dress of Her Royal Highness, to her great amusement. When I was about five years old, I did not take a cold bath with equal philosophy. I had on a new pink pelisse, and I ran away from these streaming dogs backwards and plunged head-foremost into the river; between the shock and the damage done to my fine clothes, I was completely upset, and wept all the way home.

A large corner, now taken into the Gardens, at the western extremity, was then an untidy barrack-yard, and immediately opposite the present lodge to the Park stood a homely brick house which for forty years was the resort of most of the interesting people of the time, English and foreign. It was built by my father, the late Nassau William Senior, about the year 1826.

When he first married, Mr. Senior, for the sake of my mother, who thought she could not breathe in the streets of London, took a small house (No. 32) in Kensington Square, then almost in the country. From its windows they often saw Cobbett working in his garden, and caught a glimpse of Talleyrand limping round the Square. James Mill, also, was a near neighbour; his more celebrated son John was one of my father's great friends: in my early youth I had the honour of dancing a quadrille with him.

Many authors and artists lived then, as now, in Kensington, and there was no lack of society. My father used to frequent the parties of the Duke of Sussex and the Duchess of Kent at the Palace, and at Holland House he was a welcome guest. Callcott, Wilkie, and Sir Thomas Lawrence lived near, and my brother, when a very little boy, sat for one of Lawrence's pictures (the boy playing with a dog), and our own dog Moulsey, a fine Norfolk spaniel, for one of Wilkie's. Periodical balls were given at the King's Arms (the site of which ancient hostelry is now occupied by a sky-high new hotel), and in it was kept a sedan-chair, in which I remember going with my brother, some time in the dark ages, to a children's party.

The house at Kensington becoming too small for the family, my father took a piece of ground, which in his walks to and fro had struck him as an eligible site, and built upon it the house to which I have already alluded, opposite the Park. Neither money nor pains were bestowed on the outside. My father never appreciated the beauties of the modern villa, and certainly No. 13, Hyde Park Gate had no claim to the name, although, in a sarcastic article written by some political opponent, Mr. Senior was described as 'dictating from his villa at Kensington.'

There could not be a more delightful situation, the Park and Gardens in front and the real country behind. There is a miniature of my brother and myself as little children, sitting by an open window, through which is a lovely country view, with the Surrey hills in the distance. This was the view from our back drawing-room; every inch of it is now covered by bricks and stucco.

The road which divided us from the Park was very cheerful in those pre-railroad days. The turnpike was just below, and every evening at eight the mails assembled and halted in front of our nursery windows. The gay red liveries, the guards blowing their horns, the prancing horses, were a never-failing delight to the little people within, and almost made up for the flatness of going to bed. Before the house was quite finished my father took us all to St. Leonards, and it was there that, when I was about two, the event occurred which is my first recollection in life. I was lying before the fire, with my doll in my arms, my nurse having left the room for a few minutes, when a live coal jumped out and settled in my neck. I remember well, strange to say, not the pain, but the hubbub which ensued, and the potato-parings which were tied round my neck with a red bandana handkerchief, and being afterwards set upon my mother's bed for inspection.

The next few years seem to me to have been chiefly spent in the garden at Hyde Park Gate. It was an enchanting playground. The small plot in front was uninteresting; a damp gravel passage connected it with the garden at the back. This passage was not without its charm, for in one corner stood the tap whence we filled our watering-pots and proceeded to soak our pinafores and flowers. Of flowers, however, there were few, for my father loved his trees and creepers, which grew with astonishing rapidity and overshadowed the borders. There was no attempt at the sort of gardening we aim at in the present day; the wide lawn and shady trees were the only attractions, consequently there was little to spoil. It was the scene of our revels, in which we were aided and abetted by our next-door neighbours and earliest playfellows, the children of Sir James Stephen, of the Colonial Office, and their friend Frederick Gibbs, all more or less distinguished in after-life. My nearest contemporary was the late Judge, at that time a charming little boy with long fair hair curling over his shoulders.

One day we had a grand siege. The gardener had tyrannically locked up our dogs in the lower part of the garden, which was enclosed within high walls. We battered the door; it would not give way. At length two or three of the boys, encouraged by the barking and howling of the prisoners, climbed over the wall and brought the victims triumphantly down in their arms. On another occasion my brother thought of a splendid piece of mischief. The beer-barrel stood somewhere in the back premises, likewise some empty soda-water bottles, which he filled with the intoxicating beverage. We sat down comfortably to imbibe, and buried our bottles when we had finished. But, alas! when we were called in to tea we could not walk straight, and my brother shortly disappeared under the tea-table. We were ordered summarily off to bed, and my brother, who had a prodigious memory, had to learn pages of Racine by heart.

It used to be a great punishment when we exchanged the liberty and shade of our garden for a little house at the seaside, whither our mother thought it good to take us every summer, and where my brother and I always got into terrible scrapes for want of something to do and of space to exercise our voices and muscles.

When we had got over childish tricks our circle was often enlarged by Lucy Austin, afterwards Lady Duff Gordon. She was older than any of us, and wherever she went she commanded. She was tall, handsome, precocious, and self-confident, but so good-natured and amusing that we submitted willingly to her temporary rule. She used to organize wonderful games, especially charades. On one occasion the word was 'romantic,' and the last scene was to end in an elopement. The lover was bashful, so Lucy donned cloak and hat and showed him how to act his part with the most passionate emphasis and enjoyment. One of our principal performers was the late Sir Herbert Edwardes, of Indian celebrity. He was about the same age as our elder boys, and studied with them at King's College. He was full of fun, very witty, and a capital caricaturist. We all suffered at his hands in very droll little sketches, in which my long pig-tails, the fashion in those days, played a conspicuous part.

It was not only to the younger members of the family that the neighbourhood of the Stephens was a boon.

Sir James (then Mr. Stephen) used to call for my father every morning on his way into town. Another walking-companion was John Stuart Mill. He used to stride up and down our dining-room, as we were finishing breakfast, talking energetically in his calm, measured tones. I remember an account which he gave us of a tour in Italy, which interested me extremely. We lost sight of him, but not altogether, after he married and lived in the country. With the Stephens, on the other hand, although they also left London before I was quite grown up, our intimacy never slackened, and Sir James was so kind as to extend it to the younger generation. He used to say that change of place was a great refreshment to him, and that when a man began to grow old he felt the absolute necessity for looking on the face of Nature. I used to visit them wherever they pitched their tent. Every afternoon in the country we sallied forth for a two hours' walk. This he called winding up the clock. I remember how he used to skim over the ground at Haileybury, his wide-brimmed hat crowned with large ferns to keep off the flies. Every morning he worked in his study with a little National-School boy, who read to him with the most intolerable accent and absence of comprehension. My room was next-door, and I heard the reading going on and wondered how he could endure it. His sight was so bad that his historical studies had to be carried on in this way, but his memory was so accurate that he could point out the volume and even the page to which he wished to refer. He would talk at leisure times by the hour together, in somewhat of a monotone, with his eyes shut, deeply interested and interesting his hearers in his subject. He had a dash of romance which would surprise no reader of his 'Ecclesiastical and Historical Essays.' The epilogue, which does justice to all denominations, and expresses a trust that no human being will be sentenced to eternal damnation, created a great sensation in the orthodox world. It was a subject which constantly engrossed his thoughts. I once heard him say, 'If, as I walk up Fleet Street, I believed that most of the myriads of human beings whom I meet were doomed to perish or suffer everlastingly, I could not endure to live.' He always declared that he should not live beyond his seventieth year—the allotted age of man—and in his seventy-first year he died, happily before his wife, for he never could have borne her loss. She was a woman calculated to awaken romance in a less imaginative mind than his. Beautiful from her radiant expression, her disposition was angelic. I remember once, when we children were playing in her drawing-room, one of us knocked over the lamp with a crash, which brought Mrs. Stephen in from the adjoining study, where she was writing at her husband's dictation. She gave us a sharp reprimand and went back. We stood repentant and aghast. In a few minutes she returned, her face beaming with kindness, and apologized to us for having lost her temper. We could have worshipped her. She was full of poetical feeling, and shortly before her death she gave my little girl and me such a vivid description of a railway-train gradually approaching and then flashing past in the darkness, that her little listener of four years will never forget it.

Malthus was, in early days, a great deal in our house, but all I remember of him is that he had a cloven palate which impeded his utterance. Blanco White was my brother's tutor and very affectionate and kind to me. I can see him now running to meet me with outstretched arms after a short absence. He played exquisitely on the violin, and I remember his going with my mother to hear Paganini. He had been a Spanish priest, and the book he wrote on his conversion, 'Leucadio Doblado,' is very curious and made a great sensation. A young sister of my father, who had been converted in Rome by Cardinal Wiseman, found the book on the table after she returned to our house. After reading it she exclaimed :

'Who can have written this book, filled with lies?'

'I did,' replied Blanco White.

She was never easy till she got him to talk of it, and give his reasons for changing his opinions. A long stay at Archbishop Whately's completed her cure.

CHAPTER II.

EARLY FRIENDS.

WHATELY was the greatest friend my father had ; their intimacy began at college. It had not entered into my father's plans to strive for honours. In a letter to my brother, written many years afterwards, he says :

' My defect was in not having employed the first years of my residence in the studies of the place ; but I was elected* at sixteen years of age, and found the tutor anxious only to make his tutorship a sine-cure. I should have employed my two first years in the preparation for a first class. As it was I did not altogether waste them, for I read a great deal of Latin, French, and English, and some Greek.'

He wrote to his father :

' MY DEAR FATHER,

' I have been plucked. I will get first class next term.'

And he added a funny little drawing of a boy flinging a lexicon at his tutor's head.

* A demy of Magdalen.

It was in Divinity that he failed. To the question, 'What is the inward and spiritual grace of baptism?' he replied in the sense but not in the words of the Catechism, and on being reprimanded, he answered that if he had been asked the question when he was a child, he could have replied more accurately. Whereupon he was plucked. He at once engaged the services of Whately, who was then rising into notice as the first private tutor in Logic and Aristotle that the University possessed, and with his assistance and his own indefatigable exertions achieved the unprecedented triumph of winning at the very next public examination the highest class of honours after a few months' application.

He wrote to his tutor :

'DEAR WHATELY,

'I had got ready plenty of fine, or rather strong (for they would have been true), speeches to express how truly I felt my obligations to you, but the present event has spoiled all the need of them, for, solely owing to you as it is, it is what only the highest talents and the most friendly zeal in a tutor could have procured. . . . You may suppose how many people I have to astonish with the news, so for the present adieu.

'Believe me, most sincerely and gratefully yours,

'N. W. S.'

For more than half a century the pupil and master remained firm friends, and they died within a few months of each other. Our house was Archbishop Whately's home whenever he wished to come to London, and I cannot remember the time when his tall, gaunt figure was not familiar to me. He was very kind to us children (he was my brother's godfather), but he had a way of holding us over his head with outstretched arms; this he called turning us into weathercocks, and it used to frighten me to death. When at that sublime altitude he would turn us round and round, and the next minute he would be crawling over the floor and growling like a lion. I liked it much better when he pretended to have a little pig squealing and running under his handkerchief, or taught us to make boomerangs, and told us about the trees and beasts and birds in Australia. I fancy that his deep interest in the colonies was partly caused by his anxiety to suppress transportation.

One of his favourite occupations was budding trees. We had two mulberry trees, which, together with a copper beech and a weeping ash, formed the glory of our lawn. We owed the second mulberry tree to the Archbishop's skill. A large branch of the parent tree was for some time subjected to treatment, and then cut off and transplanted. It grew and flourished, and was a complete success.

He was utterly regardless of appearance. If he came to us without a servant, and perceived a hole in his black stocking, he would put a piece of sticking-plaster on the corresponding part of his leg to conceal the defect. He used to sit by my side at breakfast, balancing his chair, with his legs twisted into some extraordinary knot which could not be untied in a hurry, playing with the tea-leaves, and scattering them over the table, and setting down his wet cup on the cloth so as to make a succession of little rings—totally engrossed in the conversation that was going on. I never knew anyone drink so much tea except Dean Stanley. They would both gather round the tea-table and imbibe cup after cup till the tea became so attenuated that they could relish no more.

I often thought that Whately resembled Dr. Johnson in other respects besides his capacity for tea and talk. He had the same good sense, the same power of picturesque illustration, the same sincere piety, but entirely without the old doctor's bigotry and superstition—he used to say that children were taught intolerance from their earliest years in the nursery rhyme :

‘ There was an old man who wouldn't say his prayers,
Take him by the left leg and throw him downstairs ’—

the same originality, the same generosity, for he was known more than once to give £1,000 to a deserving object, although he declared that he had never given a penny to a beggar. His rule was to spend the whole of his official income on his diocese. He lived as a gentleman with about £3,000 a year might live. He had a house, Redesdale, a few miles from Dublin, as well as the palace on Stephen's Green, and in neither was there the least show or luxury. After Mrs. Whately's death he gave up Redesdale and took a much smaller house, called Roebuck. When my father and I visited him there in 1862 we could not find the place, and asked several passers-by for the Archbishop's house, but all professed ignorance. At last we asked for Archbishop Whately's house.

‘Ah! is it Misther Whately ye mane?’ was the reply; and we were shown it at once.

His theological works read somewhat cold in the present day. He was not a mystic, but rested faith entirely on reason. There never were such excellent schoolbooks as those he compiled for the National schools, avoiding all topics likely to disturb the consciences of Protestants or Roman Catholics. Archbishop Murray and he were excellent friends, but since the death of that prelate a special history has been used in all the Roman Catholic schools. In it Philip of Spain is described as one of the best and wisest kings of his time, Mary Queen of Scots as ‘not only innocent, but holy’; James II. as ‘the kind and good Duke of York, truthful, generous, and affectionate, the idol of his people’; Queen Mary II. ‘was cruelly treated by her husband, William III., the inventor of blood-money, and the patron of Jonathan Wild.’

He wrote a striking book called ‘Historic Doubts,’ in which he set forth the many reasons that could be adduced for disbelieving in the individuality of Napoleon Bonaparte, as plausible as those that may be given for denying the individuality of Christ. Excellent as were his writings, Whately’s conversation was still more remarkable. Some short sentences have been preserved, such as: ‘In a dark mind, as in a dark room, enemies may lie down in different corners without their presence being known. Bring in the light, and they instantly rise and fight till the one expels the other. The inconsistency of conduct which arises from the co-existence in the mind of opposite opinions is not a moral but an intellectual defect: it can be remedied only by bringing in the light.' Again, 'Honesty is the best policy, but he who is honest from this motive is not an honest man.' 'A man is not a pig because he is born in a pigstye.'

Many of such aphorisms are to be found in his editions of Bacon, of Paley, in his 'Logic and Rhetoric,' and in the selections from his commonplace book; and some of his conversations are recorded in my father's journals in Ireland.* He was accused of quoting only from his own and his friends' works. His capacity for friendship was so great that he was, perhaps, inclined to overvalue his friends' doings and writings, and his own life was too full of action and duty to leave much time for general reading. This was one cause of his originality, and an original man is apt to repeat himself. He was fond of puzzling his readers with riddles, such as: 'Why does it snow more in the night than in the day?' 'What is that which is made larger by being cut at both ends?' and the old puzzle of the snail crawling up the wall. The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill was at that time a burning question, of which and the Gorham controversy one got so tired that one was inclined to echo the words of a lady who wished that 'Gorham would marry his wife's sister and have done with it.' The Archbishop was against the prohibition, as it was, he said, 'inventing a new sin.'

He reproved me one Sunday for asking him if he was going to hear a certain preacher by saying he was 'going to attend public worship.' A lady once asked him if he was not very much out of heart, considering how much he had laboured for Ireland, that so little improvement was effected. He replied that we were 'ordered to fight, but not to conquer.' He revelled in Scott's and Miss Austen's novels and in narrative poetry: lyrical, introspective poetry was not in tune with his active, healthy mind. Although his conversation was full of wit and anecdote, he seldom or never made one laugh. He must have been deficient in humour, and yet I never knew anyone appreciate as he did the delicate humour of Miss Austen's novels. Nothing pleased him better than to get a new disciple to whom to read them. He delighted in strange, true stories. There was one in which he took a special interest, as it presented a curious problem: whether it be a woman's duty under all circumstances to live with a husband beneath her in mind and habits. It was at breakfast one day in Hyde Park Gate that the story was told and discussed;* the party present, besides our own family, consisted of Mme. Mohl and Mme. and Mlle. de Peyronnet. The heroine of the story was a woman in humble life, who married when very young a soldier, and was wrecked with him on the coast of India. All the crew and passengers were supposed to have been lost except this one woman and an officer who saved her. She was very beautiful, and he educated and married her. In time she again became a widow and returned to England. Her second husband had left her all his money; she was still very charming, and she was well received by his relations. One day her maid told her that she was going to be married to a discharged soldier; the mistress approved, and asked to see the suitor. When he was introduced, after looking steadily at him for some minutes, she went upstairs and fetched a shawl.

* Published in 1868 (Longmans).

* This story is told in Mr. Hare's 'Story of My Life,' but it is wrongly attributed to Bishop Wilberforce.

‘Do you know that shawl?’ she asked.

‘Yes,’ he replied, ‘I gave it to my wife when I married.’

‘I am your wife!’ she exclaimed.

She took him back, he drank away his senses, squandered her fortune, and finally died, after making her life miserable.

The discussion which followed was very animated. The Archbishop maintained that she was right; that she had no business to consider her own happiness; that the only worthy object for us all is to do our duty, and that when we have reached the end of this journey of life it will matter little whether we have travelled in a first-class carriage or plodded our way wearily on foot. Mme. Mohl was open-mouthed on the other side. She declared that no woman ought to degrade herself; that she ruined, not only her own life, but the lives of her husband and maid, who would have done very well if she had held her tongue and let them marry each other. She and the Archbishop went into all sorts of moral questions, and we were all very much excited. Mme. Mohl wrote to me afterwards: ‘It was a memorable conversation . . . the trimming I got for my immorality in declaring that she was a goose, and should have kept it to herself; and your leaving me in the lurch, instead of saying what you thought—that she had no right to keep her second husband’s money to maintain the first with. It was a fine story!’

Few people know that the Archbishop wrote one of the best of modern fairy-tales in a delightful child's book by Mrs. Whately, called, 'Reverses; or, The Fairfax Family.' The tale is called 'Norval,' and describes a shepherd lad, disgusted with his position, who falls asleep in a fairies' ring, and wakes up to witness their revels. He longs to be a fairy, and is admitted to their band. The complete disillusion, and his endeavours to regain his mortal state, are admirably told and very suggestive.

We had the happiness of knowing Sydney Smith, the most genial, witty, and humorous of men. I have not, however, much to say about him, although he was frequently at our house, for he died just before I came out. He, however, took a great deal of notice of us children. He used to pretend that my father did not appreciate me. "De minimis non curat lex," which being interpreted,' he said, 'meant, "The Master in Chancery does not care for Minnie."' In 1837 we all went to Combe Florey, and he gave me the 'Mysteries of Udolpho' to read, which absorbed me almost as much as they did Catharine in 'Northanger Abbey.'

There was a pony, and the question was which of us, my brother or myself, was to ride it. Our host settled the problem by taking a book and saying that the first letter he came to beginning either of our names was to be that of the winner. We bought of him a beautiful chestnut mare, which I used to ride, and that we called Sydney. I remember his humorous account of how he doctored the villagers; and I recollect his calling one day at Hyde Park Gate when we were decorating our house, and suggesting all sorts of amusing subjects illustrating the Poor Law and Political Economy for adorning the walls and ceiling. His fun was absolutely spontaneous ; he enjoyed it as much as his hearers. His cordial manner, the way in which you saw a joke dawn in his face, and his hearty laughter after (never before, for that is fatal) he spoke, added much to the effect of what he said.

The subject of all others which engrossed my father's thought in early days was the state of the poor. Many years afterwards, when I was riding with him in the green lanes round Hampstead (now, alas! covered with houses), he said to me, 'When I was twenty-five I resolved to reform the English Poor Laws.' His early life in his father's parsonage had shown him the demoralising effect of the existing system, and in 1830, a few days after Lord Melbourne became Home Secretary, he asked Mr. Senior to inquire into the subject of combinations and strikes. The result was a Report,* which is still in the annals of the Home Office. The Royal Commission for the Amendment of the Poor Law, of which my father was the leading member, soon followed, and caused a complete change in the system of relief. A knighthood and a sum of money were offered to him, and refused. He also declined a Canadian Governorship, but he was very grateful to Lord Melbourne for appointing him one of the twelve Masters in Chancery in 1836. It was not an increase of income but of leisure, which he valued far more.

He was at that time a successful conveyancer. His only legal instructor had been Lord Chancellor Sugden, who has often told me of the visit to his chambers of a middle-aged clergyman and his son, whom he offered as a pupil. The offer was accepted, and from a pupil my father soon became an intimate friend. The work entrusted to him was done so well and so quickly that his teacher acquired a high opinion of his talent, and when Mr. Sugden took silk Nassau Senior succeeded to a great part of his business. He was welcomed to Sugden's house, where his dislike of dancing, music and cards was sometimes embarrassing to his hostess ; but he was always ready to talk, and still more to listen to any conversation worth hearing.

* Its substance is contained in an article in 'Historical and Philosophical Essays' (Longmans), 1865.

The career of Lord St. Leonards was a very successful one. He was born in humble life, and rose to the very top of his profession. I once asked him to describe his day. 'Well,' he replied, 'I will tell you what my life was as Attorney-General. I will begin at 3 a.m., when you may imagine me staggering with fatigue up the steps of my house in Guildford Street on my return from the House of Commons, to find Lady Sugden waiting for me with a cup of tea. I then used to go to bed, with strict injunctions to be called at six. My briefs were brought to me, and I set to work for a couple of hours. I then had breakfast, and slept for a short time before I had to attend consultations. At ten o'clock I went into court, and there remained until it was time to go to the House, where I stayed answering questions until the small hours of the morning. Often I was called upon to make a speech at the end of the debate, and so da capo to the next day of toil and trouble.'

On one occasion when he was Lord Chancellor he had to reply to the Duke of Newcastle, who annoyed him by speaking of him constantly as a lawyer. He got tired of this, and said : ' I do not understand why the noble Duke is constantly calling me a "lawyer" : I have never called him a "statesman." '

He went through all this labour although he was subject to severe attacks of illness. Even these did not permanently injure him, for on his ninetieth birthday I took my little children to Boyle Farm and heard him make a speech to the school-children of the neighbourhood, to whom he gave a fête in commemoration of the event, and he lived four years afterwards. He told me an amusing story of his being shut up in the great lunatic asylum near Dublin when he was Irish Chancellor. All went well till he tried to get out, when the officials strenuously opposed his departure. ' But I am the Lord Chancellor,' he said. ' Ah, I dare say,' was the answer ; ' we have a many Lord Chancellors here !'

I delight in pomps and vanities. I saw as a child the Coronation procession from Crockford's, in St. James's Street, and, next to our Queen, I was most interested in Marshal Soult. I used to enjoy Her Majesty's Drawing-Room, but above all other pageants I liked the opening of Parliament, before the lamented death of the Prince Consort always performed by the Queen herself. My father's position as Master in Chancery—the Masters used to sit in turn on the woolsack, and carry messages from one House to the other—enabled him always to obtain for me a Peer's ticket. The very first time was on the occasion of the Queen announcing her marriage. The Bishop of Llandaff (Copleston) gave me his ticket under protest, for he said that he could not approve of a little girl being taken to witness the, in his opinion, indelicate act of a lady announcing her own marriage. Luckily, my father did not agree with him, and I shall never forget the splendid scene. It was in the old House of Lords, much smaller than the present. I sat up in a little gallery over the woolsack between the beautiful Lady Dufferin and Miss Pitt, a very handsome maid of honour. They were exceedingly kind to me. I remember well the Queen's sweet voice and that the paper shook in her hand. By her side stood Lord Melbourne repeating inaudibly—we could see his lips move—every word she uttered.

Although never again on such an interesting occasion, I never tired of the ceremony. The gorgeous new House of Lords, the Peers in their robes, every lady in her finest dress, shown up by the gleams of sunshine through the high stained windows, and then the cannon which announced her Majesty's departure from Buckingham Palace, followed by the flourish of trumpets when she arrived, and the distant sound of the band. At length the doors were flung open, and in came the Ministers bearing the royal insignia, followed by the Queen hand-in-hand with her Consort, and the attendant ladies behind—a real fairy-tale Queen, with a crown on her head, and a long scarlet-and-ermine train, which was arranged over the back of the throne. A pause ensued, during which the Queen had always to be reminded to say, in her silver tones, 'I pray you, my Lords, be seated.' Then the gentlemen of the House of Commons came clattering in like schoolboys escaped from school, and when at last silence was obtained the Queen read as no one else could read the Royal Speech. There was reality as well as romance and splendour in the scene, and I have never seen any other to come up to it.

In the year when he was appointed Master in Chancery my father made an addition to his house. He added three rooms twenty-four feet square opening out of the old drawing-room, dining-room, and bedrooms. He did all his writing in the old dining-room, now lined with books, and called the library. He was so thoroughly social that he liked us all to be sitting in the room, or, at any rate, to be running in and out of it. I remember once bursting in when I was a child, and seeing a short, dark, stout gentleman, whom my father called the Comte de Survilliers, alias the ex-King Joseph of Spain. On that occasion he told my father, after a eulogy of Napoleon Bonaparte, that his brother was 'plutôt bon homme que grand homme.'

Over the addition to the hall was a large conservatory opening into the new drawing-room, which we called the music-room, and later on most eloquent music was discoursed within its walls. A shutter, composed of a large mirror, was drawn in the evening across the window looking into the Park.

There never were rooms better adapted for society. Lady Duff Gordon used to say that ours was the best house she knew to meet a friend or avoid a bore. Sydney Smith called it the chapel-of-ease to Lansdowne House, where everyone with any claim to distinction or celebrity gathered round Lord Lansdowne—the Mæcenas of the age.

The furniture of our rooms was by no means æsthetic. There were some good pictures and statues, quantities of books, and comfortable chairs and sofas ; but the sofas stood straight instead of askew, and an ottoman occupied the middle of the room.

A rather large table, on which we had tea, stood just within the opening into the next room, and many a pleasant talk we had round it. Everyone is afraid now of drinking tea at night, but in those days, when hours were earlier, the men as they came up from dinner were sure to gather round the tea-table and the tea-maker.

Ours was one of the first houses where afternoon tea was an institution. It was the custom to ride all through the spring and summer from five to seven, and when my father came home to fetch me in the afternoon he used to find me drinking a cup of the servants' tea brought to me by my maid. He very soon joined in this agreeable habit, and tea was served regularly at four o'clock. Many of our friends found this out, and we had very merry little meetings at that hour before our daily ride.

The ride in Rotten Row was a much more important function than it is now. Afternoon parties were rare, and were voted bores, and ladies' days of reception, except Sunday afternoons, were unknown. Three times a week a military band played to a motley, as well as a fashionable, audience, on foot, in Kensington Gardens, just before the bridge over the Serpentine, and the riders used to congregate round on the edge of the road. Often the Queen in her carriage, with her military escort and outriders in scarlet liveries, would sweep through the Row, and the riders form into a hedge on either side, their horses reduced to unwilling obedience. Then the band would strike up 'God save the Queen!' and loyalty was stirred in every breast.

Nowhere but in London could such a scene take place—such an assemblage of fine horses and men and women completely at home in their saddles. Any attempt at show-off was in bad taste. The Emperor, at that time Prince Louis Napoleon, used to mount a fiery steed which pranced and curvetted down the Row, and excited nothing but ridicule. People of all sorts and ages rode: bishops, ministers, politicians, idlers, lawyers, beside the gay motes brought out by the London season.

Early in the forties I was promoted to ride with my father, and for more than twenty years we were joined in turn by nearly all the most distinguished men of the day, including Delane, the formidable editor of the Times, and by no one more frequently than Lord Lansdowne, who talked over almost every political question with Mr. Senior. When in London they met several times a week, and when parted they kept up a lively correspondence, of which I have many letters on both sides. They were first drawn together by the new Poor Law Commission, and remained through life the most intimate friends.

Lord Lansdowne was like my father in one respect: he preferred listening to talking, but in a small party no one told better stories or was more agreeable. His kindness and courtesy were perfect. He was essentially a 'Grand Seigneur,' and fulfilled all the demands made by society on those who occupy an exalted position. At Bowood he had a splendid collection of pictures, most of which were chosen by himself, and his London house was also full of treasures. He was exceedingly fond of music, and there never were such concerts as those at Lansdowne House.

It was in the palmy days of Italian opera, and Mario, Grisi, Persiani, Lablache, Tamburini, were all heard within the walls of the magnificent concert-room. None but the best singers were admitted to perform. Everybody made a point of being punctual, although the room was never crowded. The Royalties, the Duke of Wellington, and other great grandees sat in front. Presently a thrill went through the audience when Lord Lansdowne entered with Grisi on his arm, followed by the other performers. They always sang their best at Lansdowne House, for they knew how highly they were appreciated by their courteous host. The dinners and evening parties were equally pleasant. Besides all the celebrated people one wished to stare at, one met all one's most agreeable friends.

My first great party was at Lansdowne House, and I was introduced to the poet Moore, whose last party it was.* As everybody knows, his cottage was near

* A young friend insists upon it that I should say what dress I wore. It was a pale-blue silk, with what was called a Swiss bodice, the sleeves and front laced over white silk. If the party had been a ball I should have worn tarlatan, as young ladies never danced in silk. I had some wheat-ears, in silver and pearls, in my hair, which was in ringlets according to the fashion of the day. I followed my parents on the arm of Lord Glenelg, who had snow-white hair; and the people around whispered, 'Spring and winter!'

Bowood, where a room was always reserved for him, and called the Poet's Room.

My father spent some time of every year at Bowood. There is a fine story of his being busily writing, quite abstracted as usual, in a room full of company, to whom Moore was singing, and the scratch of my father's pen was by no means an agreeable accompaniment, so one of the guests said, very politely :

'You are not fond of music, Mr. Senior?'

'No,' said my father ; 'but it does not disturb me in the least. Pray go on.'

It was not until the year 1850 that I was promoted to accompany my father in these interesting visits. The society was composed of the same elements as that at Lansdowne House : statesmen, philosophers, authors, beauties, artists, and distinguished people of all sorts. I remember very few musicians, but probably my father was not invited to the musical parties, as he was absolutely without ear and had to be told when 'God save the Queen!' was played.

I remember one visit to Bowood, when the last four blue coats and brass buttons—the ordinary dinner-dress in the beginning of this century—were present. Our host wore one, and Lord Palmerston and Mr. Byng—called in those days Poodle Byng—the fourth, I think, was Lord John Russell.

Sometimes, at Christmas-time, there was a family party—the Howards, Lady Kerry and Mr. Gore, and the Flahaults. M. de Flahault was the father of Lady Shelburne—the late Dowager Marchioness of Lansdowne—and Mme. de Flahault was daughter of 'Queenie,' and therefore the grand-daughter of Mrs.

Thrale. On New Year's Day the Calne band came to play in the gallery at dinner-time, and once, when they were playing 'Partant pour la Syrie,' I turned to Lord Shelburne, who was sitting next to me, and said that it must be in honour of M. de Flahault (the original of the 'jeune et beau Dunois'). He was sitting on the other side and caught what I said, and replied, 'Et j'en ai le droit puisque c'est pour moi que cela a été fait.'

On one occasion Tom Taylor got up some very amusing charades. Miss Mary Boyle, who was an admirable actress, was the prima donna. The word was Gulliver, and for the whole the late Governor-General of India, then a small boy, was discovered lying asleep, surrounded by Brobdignags of whom Sir Henry Codrington was one (he was six feet five inches, and with a head on the top of his own presented an imposing appearance).

In the mornings I generally walked alone with my father, and in the afternoons some drove, but my father and I always joined the troop of riders, who, with Lord Lansdowne at their head, went scouring over the country.

Long before my time Miss Edgworth was staying at Bowood with her sister, and on the morning fixed for their departure Lord Lansdowne was handing her into her carriage, and said, with his exquisite urbanity, 'I am sorry you cannot stay longer;' whereupon she replied, 'Oh! but, my lord, we can.' The trunks were taken off, the carriage sent away, and the ladies returned, to the consternation of their hosts.

There was nothing aristocratic in Lord Lansdowne's appearance. He was small and spare; he had very bushy eyebrows, and by no means regular features ; but, when he began to speak, his voice, manner, and enunciation proclaimed him the Grand Seigneur which, as I have said, he was. It was curious that he retained the pronunciation of his own early days—called Rome, ‘ Room ’; obliged, ‘ obleeged ’; China, ‘ Chaney,’ and so on.

The painter Turner’s old caretaker does not seem to have been gifted with penetration, for one of Lord Lansdowne’s favourite stories was of her calling to him up the area of the house in Queen Anne Street, where Turner stored his pictures, ‘ Please, be you the cat’s-meat man?’ Another of his stories was of driving home in the afternoon from Holland House with the Lord Dudley of those days—a singularly absent man, given to talk to himself. When they reached the turnpike at Hyde Park Corner, Lord Dudley began soliloquizing : ‘ I suppose I must ask this man to dinner. It’s a great bore ; I don’t want him.’ So Lord Lansdowne began in turn : ‘ I hope I shan’t be obliged to dine with this man. It’s a great nuisance ; he gives shocking bad dinners.’ This consideration would not really have had much weight in Lord Lansdowne’s mind, for he told us that, when the French Ambassador, M. de St. Aulaire, left London, the Lansdownes inherited his chef. After a short time the cook gave warning, and, when asked what he had to complain of, said that there was ‘ nothing against M. and Mme. de Lansdowne ; but they never said anything about the dinners, and no chef who respected himself could stand that.’ So they began to praise and blame, and the cook was happy.

Our last visit to Bowood was in the winter of 1862-63. For the last few years, as we drove through what were called the 'Golden Gates' of the Park, I had not been able to help saying, 'We shall probably never come here again,' and my father answered, rather impatiently, 'You have said that so often that I am quite tired of hearing it.' But this was the last time for host and guest.

CHAPTER III.

SOME FOREIGN FRIENDS.

MR. SENIOR soon extended his social relations to foreign countries. In 1830 he visited Paris for the first time, and Brussels. He only passed through Paris, but in Brussels, where he already had friends, he made a much longer stay.

Many Italian exiles took refuge at that time in Belgium, and of these many were known to us in London. The most distinguished, perhaps, were the Marquis and Marchioness Arconati, who lived in the fine old château of Gaesbeck, surrounded by a little court of their countrymen, in which Count Arrivabene was prime minister, and the poet Berchet, Scalvini, and Collegno were the principal courtiers.

The Marchesa Costanza was one of the most remarkable and charming women of her time ; her brilliancy eclipsed her husband, who was, however, an able and excellent man. She and her sister, Countess Collegno, belonged to the ancient family of Trotti. She always reminded me of the descriptions of the ladies of the ancien régime, down to her habit of taking snuff, which much astonished my youthful mind.

After the amnesty of 1838 the Arconatis returned to Piedmont, leaving Gaesbeck to our dear old friend Count Arrivabene, who, as far back as I can remember, used to spend weeks together in Hyde Park Gate, and whom we frequently visited at Brussels and Gaesbeck. I shall never forget the delight of my brother and myself when we first found ourselves in that magnificent old castle; it seemed to realize our ideas of the fitting abode of 'knights and ladies bright,' derived from the pages of Sir Walter Scott and Meyrick's 'Ancient Armour.'

The castle stands on the edge of a steep declivity, looking south and west over a Flemish landscape, highly cultivated, dotted with farmhouses, and greatly resembling the fine Rubens in the National Gallery. To the north and east is a large beech forest; we used to ramble and lose ourselves in its avenues, and in the never-ending corridors and chambers of the old castle, which is as large as a village. There had originally been six, in our time there were four, huge towers. In one was the drawing-room, a circular room forty feet in diameter; the walls were ten feet thick, and each window formed a little sitting-room.

The castle was inaccessible in bad weather, on account of the horrible state of the roads, at which the inhabitants rejoiced, for otherwise, as they were only five miles from Brussels, they would have been overrun with sightseers.

Another of my father's Belgian friends was Quêtelet, one of the most distinguished men that the Low Countries have produced. He created the Observatoire, and was a voluminous writer on science and statistics. Prince Albert, as a youth, was his pupil, and entertained ever afterwards the most friendly relations with him. He told my father that Prince Albert had the most charming disposition of anyone he had ever known. In 1851 Quêtelet visited London, where he was much appreciated. Years before, the Prince had said to him that, if he were a Sovereign, he would despise etiquette, and live with the most cultivated and intelligent people of the country. When Quêtelet visited his old pupil in England, he asked the Prince if he found himself able to carry out his intention. 'Not altogether,' he replied.

When at Brussels, and also in London, my father had frequently the honour of being sent for by King Leopold, whose conversation* he greatly enjoyed. Quêtelet, who was intimate with both Princes, drew the following comparison between them: 'The King has a remarkable extent of knowledge and clearness of judgment, and he has the great advantage of perfect self-reliance. Prince Albert scarcely does justice to his own superiority. He is too modest: he seems not to be aware of his own talents and knowledge. The King never forgets his.'

'I ventured,' Mr. Senior replied, 'when I had an audience from the King, to talk to him as I should to any other man for whose information and ability I had a great respect. I sometimes asked questions, and did not always agree with him; in fact, I was so much interested that I forgot that my interlocutor was royal.'

'You were quite right,' rejoined Quêtelet, 'and the length of your audience is a proof.'

* Published in the 'Conversations with Thiers, Guizot,' etc.

My father and mother spent almost all the legal vacations abroad, and took us children with them. My mother had a fancy for German waters, and usually started off with us in July, leaving my father to follow. We travelled very leisurely, in our own carriage, stopping whenever my mother felt tired, whereby we made acquaintance with many out-of-the-way places and horrible inns.

Not long before our Queen's marriage we went to Carlsbad. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Prince Albert were there, and I had the honour of dancing with the Prince at a ball given by his father, who was, of course, extremely civil to the English, and particularly asked my mother to bring me, although it was long before I had any right to appear at a grown-up ball. Prince Albert was the handsomest young man I ever saw.

There were a great many interesting people at Carlsbad. Lady William Russell, the Austins, Listers, Michel Chevalier, and others. To me the most interesting were a Polish family, the Mierzejewskis. The Count owned estates as big as Saxony, but took care to be as little as possible in his own country. The Countess was never in the same place as her family. The Czar Alexander I. had been a great friend of hers, and he begged her, so we were told, never to cut the nail of the little finger of her left hand, but to keep it intact in remembrance of him. We fell in with her once at Dresden, and I tried hard to see that little finger, but never succeeded: it was always hidden within her shawl. The daughters, who always lived with their father, were charming, especially the younger, Constance ; she was very beautiful and graceful, and when she spoke of the wrongs of Poland her eyes sparkled and her cheeks flushed, and she looked inspired. I was completely fascinated by her.

We went again the next year to Carlsbad, and in succeeding years to Marienbad, Franzesbad, Töplitz, Kissengen, and on the way we visited many small German towns—Nuremberg, Aschaffenburg, Bamberg, Bayreuth, Brunswick, Fulda, Cassel, etc. We had plenty of time to survey the country ; at every post-house ‘Gleich, gleich’ meant that we should get horses in about an hour. At one place a crowd collected round us, and when we asked the reason we were told that they had seen Lord Palmerston’s name on our passport, and wished to see that ‘berühmter man,’ as they supposed my father was he. At that time our Foreign Secretary was a terror to the Continent.

I am very glad of the recollections of those days. Does anyone now go to see the sun rise from the top of the Brocken, or the black splash on the wall where Luther flung the inkstand at the devil? I fancy Bayreuth even is only visited when the operas are going on, when crowds congregate and lodgings are at fabulous prices.

I did not, however, enjoy myself much at the time, for the irregular hours and want of sleep and food made me ill after a week or two. It was better when I grew older, and I remember the two months we passed at Dresden with great pleasure. My seventeenth birthday was spent there, and at last I was treated as a grown-up person, the summit of my ambition. We came in for the very end of Schröder Devrient's career, and thrilled over the 'Huguenots' and 'Fidelio.' Music and painting can be enjoyed in perfection in that pretty capital: excellent concerts for about sixpence, and the best places at the opera for two or three shillings. The picture-gallery, although small, contains the finest picture in the world, the 'Madonna di San Sisto,' and the 'Cristo della Moneta,' the most dignified representation of our Saviour that I know.

We were acquainted with many German families, the Von der Grœbens, the Krusens, and the Von Krauses. The latter lived in the same house with us, and the younger daughter, Louise, became my intimate friend. It was at Dresden that we first knew Mr. and Mrs. Robert Noel. They had not long been married, and were the handsomest couple possible. He was a very clever man, but he committed the error of entering no regular profession. He lived abroad, knew Metternich and all the foremost men in Germany, and spent his time in the brilliant society of Vienna, until he fell in love with and married the Baroness Haitzinger, who was a Chanoinesse and always wore the cross of her order. Her voice was as beautiful as her face, and it was delightful to hear her and Louise von Krause sing. The Noels' dearest friends were the Counts von Thun, and they spent an enchanting honeymoon of fifteen or twenty years in a rose-covered cottage in the Saxon Switzerland, close under the gates of the Thuns' Castle. When he began to grow old Mr. Noel longed for a more active life in his own country, and they came to London. It was a sad change. A small house in South Kensington is not like a cottage in the Saxon Switzerland, and although they were both very attractive, society is not easy with a very narrow income in London. He wrote a book on phrenology, but that science had gone out of fashion, and he contributed several interesting articles on German politics and statesmen to various magazines which it would be interesting to recover. He was a near relation of Lady Noel Byron, and saw much of that family, All who knew him and his charming wife were proud to be numbered among their friends.

From Dresden we went to spend a few days with the Count and Countess zu Solms Wildenfels (whose acquaintance we made at Marienbad) in the neighbourhood of Zwickau. He was a mediatised Prince, a nephew of the Duchess of Kent. A man with a sword always stood behind his chair at meals, in token of his sovereignty. We breakfasted at half past seven, rambled about all the morning in an exquisitely beautiful country, dined at two, and drove every afternoon at full gallop up and down precipices in carriages that seemed to be coming to pieces, drawn by horses as rough as bears over roads that would have done dishonour to an Indian settlement. Then home to tea at seven.

The house was full of young people ; it was difficult to discover their relationships. The Countess was her husband's niece, and consequently first cousin to her stepchildren. From seven to nine we all, old and young, indulged in very noisy games—blind-man's buff, hunt the debtor (a German form of hunt the slipper), forfeits, etc. Supper at nine, and then games again till eleven, when each gentleman gave his arm to a lady, and we all marched in solemn procession upstairs to our bedrooms, where our cavaliers took leave of us in the middle of the room with a profound bow, on which we dropped a deep curtsy.

We seemed to be living in the last century ; it was a most amusing and interesting visit, and our hosts were as kind as possible. The peasantry round Zwickau were very primitive. The women wore a very ugly, curious costume—a sort of helmet and breastplate, and a skirt hardly reaching to their knees.*

It was my great desire to cross the Alps, and I attained my wish in 1846. Our carriage was put on the steamboat at Cologne (I suppose no one goes up the Rhine in that manner now), and we steamed in two days to Basle. We paid a delightful visit to the Marcets at Malagni, and saw many of our Swiss friends then as now, bearing the names of Marcet, De la Rive, Prévost, Haldimand. There was, happily, no railroad over the Mont Cénis, or we should have missed the interesting experience of the gradual change in the vegetation as we climbed slowly, higher and higher, up the mountain until we reached the region of perpetual snow, the pine-trees, and the green tarn at the top. Thence we had a magnificent view of the plain of Lombardy, bathed in the rich glow of the setting sun. Rushing down the zig-zag road at full speed to Susa was a delicious sensation, and at last we were in Italy.

* I am told that this dress is still worn at Zwickau.

We reached Turin next day. Here we had a delightful time. Our old and agreeable friend Signor Prandi, who, until the amnesty, had spent several years of exile in London, was devoted to us, and took us to see all the sights. We went to a room in the palace, and saw the Royal Family pass through on their way to mass. I shall never forget the face of Charles Albert. It was the saddest and most interesting I ever beheld. Three years afterwards he died of a broken heart.

The society of Turin was at that time most agreeable; it was small, but not provincial, and there was a youth, a freshness, and a hope about it, produced by the feeling that the deliverance of Italy from the Austrians was at hand, and would be mainly effected by the rulers of Piedmont.

We had many friends ready to welcome us, especially the Arconatis, and the famous Minister, Camille Cavour. We had long known him, for, when quite young, in the year 1836, he made my father's acquaintance on his first visit to England and Ireland. He came again a few years later, and I remember well how much my father was struck by his intelligence, and how I despised a very clever lady who said he was commonplace. He was not imposing in appearance: he was short and thick, and always wore spectacles; but his bright, expressive countenance, his delicate, girlish complexion, in which the colour came and went with every emotion, arrested attention at once, and his charming manners completed the favourable impression. He and my father took equally to each other.

An interesting pamphlet appeared two years ago, consisting of Cavour's letters to Mme. de Circourt. Mr. Senior's name is constantly mentioned. Writing in 1841, Cavour says apropos of an article on Ireland in the Edinburgh Review: 'Il est d'un de mes amis, M. Senior, l'esprit le plus éclairé de la Grande Bretagne. C'est l'économiste par excellence d'Outre-Manche. Pour mon malheur j'avais dans mon coin composé aussi un article sur l'Irlande sans me douter qu'un homme aussi supérieur que M. Senior préparait un travail sur ce sujet dans des vues absolument pareilles aux miennes. Ou peut m'accuser d'avoir copié M. Senior ce qui m'affligerait assez, ne connaissant rien de plus digne de mépris que les hommes médiocres qui veulent se parer des pensées des intelligences supérieures.'*

It is interesting to find that the views expressed by my father coincided with those of this remarkable foreigner, and also to notice his modesty in describing himself as an 'homme médiocre.' In another letter he says, speaking of Michel Chevalier, 'Depuis que vous m'avez assuré qu'il était très lié avec mon ami Senior, je n'ai plus pour lui le même éloignement.'†

* 'It is by a friend of mine, Mr. Senior, the most enlightened mind in Great Britain. He is the chief political economist across the Channel. Unfortunately for me, I had in my little corner also composed an article on Ireland, without suspecting that so superior a man as Mr. Senior was writing on the subject with exactly the same views as mine. I may be accused of copying Mr. Senior, which would greatly distress me, as I know of no more contemptible sight than that of mediocre men adorning themselves with the ideas of writers of acknowledged distinction.'

† 'Since you told me that Chevalier was very intimate with my friend Senior, I am no longer prejudiced against him.'

With this strong liking and appreciation on both sides we naturally saw a great deal of Camille Cavour in England, France, and Italy. He introduced us to his brother, the Marquis Cavour; and Count Pollon, the Sardinian Minister in London, made us acquainted with his sister, Countess Cristiani, and his brother, the Chevalier Pollon, and their respective families.

In the summer most of the Italians are in 'villeggiatura,' and they invited us to spend long days at their beautiful country houses, a little way out of Turin. The young ladies were very charming, more free than French 'demoiselles' at that date. We used to roam about all day, and dance all the evening, and not get back to Turin till late at night. The most remarkable of the girls we knew was the daughter of Marquis Cavour, of whom her uncle Camille wrote, 'She is her father's and my greatest treasure on earth.' She afterwards married the son of Marquis Alfieri Sostegno, another very delightful acquaintance we made in Turin.

There was a great deal of English blood at that time mingled with that of the Northern Italians, for a large contingent of the army was always quartered at Nice, where many English went, as now, for the winter, and several of the beautiful Italian ladies we saw in Piedmont were originally English. We found this also at Genoa, whither we proceeded leisurely in our carriage after quitting, with great regret, Turin.

Genoa was en fête, for there was a congress of 'Scienziati,' and the representatives of all nations were gathered together. We had the opportunity of seeing the inside of many fine palaces, decorated with flowers and lighted up like day, and of admiring the beautiful ladies blazing with diamonds. There was one especially, a Marchesa Balbi, who was lovely—I think most lovely one night when she left off her jewels and appeared in a simple wreath of roses, and also when we met her in the day walking about, her head covered with a white ‘mezzaro,’ such as is worn ordinarily by the women of Genoa.

There was also a Marchesa Luisa Pallavicini, who was very beautiful, in the usual Italian style—splendid dark eyes, and a clear white complexion; whereas Mme. Balbi was tall and fair, with chestnut hair—quite English-looking. On another night the Pallavicini Palace was all thrown open. In the Marchesa’s bedroom was a costly toilet-table, the brushes, etc., all of gold, and on it a copy of one of Bulwer’s novels, set open at the flyleaf, with the following inscription to our hostess in the author’s handwriting: ‘I long again to see your fair skies and to gaze once more on beauty such as Italy alone can produce.’

There was one difficulty in getting about: a thunderstorm raged incessantly. However, we got quite used to it, and thought nothing of going to balls in thunder, lightning, and in rain. One night, when, as an exception, it was tolerably fine, there was a general illumination, and we went on board a Dutch man-of-war in the harbour to see the effect, which was marred to me by a grand salute fired from our vessel, which shook us to pieces, and deafened us for hours. We made two great friends in Genoa at this time, Marquis Sauli and Mr. Henry Bowyer. Sauli became Piedmontese Minister at our Court. When I published my father's 'Journals in France and Italy,' he gave me the short biographical notices of Italian statesmen which are signed 'S.' in the notes.

We revisited Italy in the following year (September, 1847), crossing the Brenner and Ampezzo Passes. Desperate, incessant rain pursued us all through the Bavarian Alps to Innsbrück, and on to Cortina, and spoilt our pleasure in the magnificent scenery. We found the inhabitants of Cortina equally exasperated, and a grand procession took place in the evening to propitiate the patron saint, and induce him to change the weather. It met with complete success; from that time the rain ceased, and we had splendid sunshine during all the rest of the autumn.

At Venice we fell in again with the Scientific Congress, which enabled us, as at Genoa, to see the interior of palaces that had been shut up for years—for instance, the Giovanelli Palace had had no social gathering within its walls for a century. We went to a magnificent ball there. Nothing can exceed the splendour of these Italian fêtes, the enormous size of the reception rooms (when we met the Minghettis at a concert at Lansdowne House the year after, they asked, 'Where are the large apartments?'), the walls covered with gold and brocade, and hung with gorgeous paintings, and filled with beautiful women sparkling with jewels. The dancers, however, struck me as looking old, and as none but married women danced at that time (an exception was made for me as a stranger), there was no natural limit to their dancing.

One of the queens of society was an old acquaintance of ours, Countess Polcastro Quirini, and at her house we saw all the best Italian society. We also went whenever we liked to her box at the opera.

As in all Italian towns, the opera-box was the great focus of society. No one paid much attention to the music, and the box was always filled by a succession of visitors, who talked loudly and volubly. My father, on the strength of his interest in social questions, was enrolled among the 'Scienziati.' Sir Roderick Murchison and Sir Frederick Adam were also members.

One evening the amphitheatre of Palladio at Vicenza was opened for the first time for a hundred years; the famous actor, Modena, performed in the 'Ædipus Rex,' and we all went over by the train from Venice. In the same carriage with my father and me were Sir Roderick Murchison and Sir Frederick Adam. Murchison was covered with orders, for which Sir Frederick chaffed him unsparingly. But we all benefited by his decorations. When we entered the theatre we were taken for very grand personages, and conducted, with many bows, to the front and only row of chairs, and sat next to Marshal Marmont, the Duchess of Angoulême, an Austrian Archduke, and other celebrities. We had a programme printed in gold on white satin, and refreshments between the acts, while the great ladies of Venice had to sit behind on most uncomfortable classical stone benches. The scene, in imitation of the ancient Greeks, was solid, and never changed. Modena was a great actor, and we enjoyed it immensely.

Our grandeur vanished when we left the theatre: a thunderstorm was raging, and we missed our train, and had to pass the night most miserably in the coffee-room of the hotel, for every room was full. Sir Roderick laid a big screen on the ground and reposed upon that, consoling himself with brandy-and-water; while my father and I had chocolate and two chairs apiece. We were tormented with mosquitoes, and glad when at 6 a.m. we were able to return to Venice.

We stayed a day or two at all the beautiful towns in Northern Italy (Vicenza, Verona, Padua, Pavia, Milan), and reached Lecco, the classical ground of the 'Promessi sposi' on September 29. My mother and I took a lovely row on the Lake of Como to Sommariva at night; it was so hot that I took off my hat. The next day we started over the St. Gothard, and it was piercingly cold, and equally so when we reached Lucerne. I have never appreciated Switzerland; in consequence of travelling through it on returning from Italy, I missed the poetry, the warmth, and the colouring of the South. Switzerland ought to be visited alone and in spring.

Once again, in November, 1850, we crossed the Mont Cénis over into Italy, and spent some time at Turin, where we saw our old friends and acquaintances, and thence to Genoa, which was in a more sober state of mind than during the Congress. We saw there the Somervilles, and some Sicilian exiles whom we met three years before in Germany, the Princess San Cataldo, who complained bitterly of the dulness of society, and her father, the Duke Serra di Falco, and Prince Butera. As usual, the chief place of resort was the opera, although little attention was paid to the stage. The Duke Serra di Falco lived at Florence, where we found him, a few days later, a very contented exile. He was a charming old man, and a great favourite. It was difficult to believe that King Bomba thought him a dangerous rebel.

We found a great many interesting people at Florence. The great lady in society was Marchioness Lajatico, of the Corsini family, and at her house we saw everyone worth knowing, for, besides being very hospitable, she was very clever and agreeable. No one would receive the Austrians, at that time the hated rulers of Tuscany. The Grand Duke himself was not completely under the ban—at least, there were plenty of people at a ball to which we went in the palace and had the honour of being presented by our agreeable Minister, Mr. Scarlett, to the Duke and Duchess. We were all ranged in a circle, and the royal hosts went slowly round trying to say something appropriate to each guest, but not always succeeding. On another evening we went to the Villa Trollope, and were introduced to the venerable novelist, who, with her two sons, inhabited a charming villa in the then new quarter of Florence. We hired horses, and took long rides in the lovely country. I cannot say that these rides were all we could have wished, for the horses were very sorry nags. However, we saw the environs better in that way than from a carriage. The great Italian actress, Mme. Ristori, whom we afterwards knew well in Paris and London, was acting. We had the key of a box lent to us, and my father went and was much pleased, but I was not well enough to accompany him.

From Florence we went to Leghorn, and thence in a coasting steamer to Naples, where I was taken too ill to go on to Sicily. I revived during the quiet month we spent at Sorrento, in the delightful company of the Tocquevilles and M. Ampère, but fell ill again in crossing the Pontine Marshes. We took voiturier horses to our own carriage, and drove slowly by Capua, Mola di Gaeta, Terracina, and Albano to Rome. It was most beautiful, and a real privilege not to be hurried as travellers now are all through that interesting country. We entered Rome by St. John Lateran instead of the modern suburb. I have always rejoiced that I saw Rome before it was swept and garnished, when the cardinals and their retinue lit up the old streets in their purple robes; and one sometimes met the Pope himself in his splendid carriage drawn by white mules. We saw all the Easter sights, the Holy Father at that time officiating, and were blessed by him from the top of St. Peter's. A few days after we reached Rome our Sorrento friend, M. Ampère, arrived, and it would be impossible to name a more admirable and enthusiastic cicerone.

Of the many interesting people we saw (their conversations are recorded in my father's journals) I think the one who struck us most was the Duke di Sermoneta. He was said by his fellow-countrymen to be the cleverest man in Rome, and his conversation was original and full of interest, with a keen sense of dry humour.

We saw at Rome those who professed the most opposite opinions at a time when the restoration of Pio Nono was the excuse for all sorts of tyrannical measures, certainly without the knowledge of the mild, courteous gentleman who was supposed to be the head of the Government. We were told that my father was followed by a member of the police, whose duty it was to furnish a particular report of all the places and people he visited. It would have been rather a comfort if we had known it, for my father was a great roamer, and neither the streets nor the Campagna were by any means safe.

My pleasure was very much diminished by the touch of fever I caught in the Pontine Marshes. Everything seemed a labour, and it was only the knowledge that I should bitterly regret lost opportunities that made me drag myself about the churches and galleries. I cannot say that the sort of cloud hanging over me seemed to break until, after a horrible passage, in which we were in some danger, from Civita Vecchia to Marseilles, we found ourselves once more on the soil of France. This was our last visit to Italy.

CHAPTER IV.

FRIENDS IN PARIS.

I SAW Paris for the first time on our way back from Italy in 1847, in the last days of the monarchy, quiet and respectable, with the Tuileries intact (I must own the Place du Carrousel was very untidy), and before the old mediæval streets were pulled down to make room for a new Berlin.

We were fortunate in finding there George, brother of the celebrated American statesman, Charles Sumner. With the latter we had long been intimate. George Sumner was a capital showman, and took my mother and me to see sights of all sorts till we collapsed, exhausted by fatigue and the strain produced by the interest of all around us.

At that time we had comparatively few friends in Paris. The Austins were living there for cheapness (no one would do so now), and had a very agreeable circle. M. and Mme. Léon Faucher, the Tocquevilles and Guizots were very kind to us; likewise M. and Mme. Horace Say and their distinguished son Léon. Horace Say was quite charming. He had a sweet, benevolent countenance, not without shrewdness, and delightfully cordial manners. His countrymen said he was full of finesse—in a good sense.

Besides little friendly gatherings, we went several times to the theatre. One night we saw Mlle. Plessis at the Gymnase. It was an affecting part, and when she turned up her beautiful eyes and exclaimed 'Ma mère!' the audience was affected to tears. I heard a sob behind me, and turned round to see our dear friend Horace Say deeply moved, and consoling himself with pralines. The British Philistine was roused within me, and I could not help laughing, whereupon he murmured in broken accents: 'Mademoiselle n'a point de sentiment.' On another evening I had the delicious treat of hearing and seeing Lablache, Grisi, Mario, and Ronconi in the 'Puritani.' There were no long, dull passages, no distracting discords, as in the operas which find favour in the present day, no second-rate performers, no tremolo to conceal the defects of voices worn out with shouting—everything was perfect.

These were also the palmy days of Rachel, who was, without exception, the greatest actor I ever saw. If any of the young people of the present day want to know what she was like, they should turn to the admirable description of her as Vashti in the pages of 'Villette.'

I left Paris with great regret, not knowing that we were destined to spend so much time later on in the gay city, and that we should have almost as many friends there as in London.

Friendship, indeed, plays a greater part in the lives of foreigners than in ours. They are more expansive; an interchange of ideas and feelings is a necessity; social intercourse is not a labour and a trouble, but a relaxation and a delight to them. My father, however, was as sociable as if he had been born on the other side of the Channel.

In the following year (1848) the monarchy, which had seemed to be so peaceably established, fell with a shock which was felt throughout Europe.

As soon as the Whitsuntide vacation set him free, my father hastened to visit the scene of the great drama which was being acted in Paris. He came in for the attack on the Assembly, and was so much struck by all he saw and heard that he kept a journal, which was destined to be the first of a series, for in the following spring he went again, and continued to do so every year until his death in 1864. He became extremely popular in Paris; he was a Membre Correspondant of the Institut (one of the five branches of the Académie founded by Richelieu). Many of the distinguished exiles in 1848 and 1851 found almost a home in our house, and were equally hospitable to us in return.

In 1849, Léon Faucher was Minister of the Interior. Like many French statesmen, he began life as a journalist. He also published several works on economical questions; the most remarkable was his 'Studies on England.' He was elected Deputy in 1846, but made no mark in the Tribune until 1848, when his speech on the Ateliers Nationaux placed him in the first rank of politicians. He and Mme. Faucher, who was a Pole, were always very kind to us; we constantly went with them to their official box at the play and opera, and we met many distinguished Poles at their house, besides French people.

I had once an amusing interview with Mme. Faucher, illustrating the manner in which marriages are arranged on the Continent. We were both very intimate with Mme. du Quaire, at that time a very handsome widow. Mme. Faucher began by asking if I knew whether Mme. du Quaire intended to marry again. I did not wish to compromise my friend, so I replied that she had no precise intentions ('elle n'a pas de parti pris').

'Because,' said my visitor, 'I know of a young man who would like to marry her.'

'Does he know her?' I asked.

'No, but he has heard of her.'

'Well,' I said, 'remember she is a Protestant.'

"Justement, il demande une Protestante." If she would meet him at the opera, he would have a rose in his buttonhole; she might see whether she liked him.'

I repeated the conversation to Mme. du Quaire, but I never heard of any sequel to the affair.

Léon Faucher was one of the few remarkable men whom Louis Napoleon tried to attach to his Government. He served under him several times as Minister, but, finding his master incorrigibly absolute, left him in 1852. He died in 1854.

M. Wolowski, Mme. Faucher's brother, was a distinguished political economist. He was a most amiable and obliging friend. In 1870 he escaped from Paris during the siege, with great difficulty, on a mission to London. From a fat, round little man, he had become, through starvation and anxiety, thin and white and haggard. One day Sir Louis Mallet saw him at the Athenæum sitting alone before a most luxurious dinner, but with a sad face, and a tear in his eye. 'Quand je pense,' he exclaimed, 'qu'à cette heure-ci ma pauvre femme n'a pas de quoi manger. Il y a quatre canons qui couchent ma maison en joue.' He had a little grandson, who made the happiness of his life, but the poor little fellow died, and his grandfather did not long survive him.

We used often to go to the Lamartines'. He and Mme. de Lamartine never went out, and they received every evening. We used to meet there many bearded men—patriots—whom we saw nowhere else. M. de Lamartine was exceedingly handsome, and distinguished both in appearance and manner. Two magnificent large white greyhounds, his great pets, and strikingly like him, wandered about the room. He was always complaining bitterly of poverty, and there was a story that a poor old lady, who admired him very much, brought her savings as a gift to him. She was shown into his dining-room, where he was feeding his dogs with the breast of a chicken. She did not leave her bag of money with him after this experience. In his inner drawing-room was a portrait of himself, with this legend round it: 'Les siècles sont à toi, le monde est ta patrie.'

Among our friends abroad there was no one whom my father loved and valued more than Alexis de Tocqueville. He was also one of the earliest.

One day in the year 1833, when my father was quietly at work in his chambers, a knock at the door was followed by the entrance of a very young man, who said: 'Je suis Alexis de Tocqueville, et je viens faire votre connaissance.' He had no other introduction.

Mr. Senior was already well known on the Continent as a social reformer and professor of political economy; his treatises and lectures had been translated into French, Italian, and German, while Tocqueville was as yet unknown to fame, for his first great work, the 'Democracy in America,' although written, was not yet published. My father, however, at once perceived the distinction of his visitor, who came frequently to Hyde Park Gate.

I do not remember him before his second visit in 1835, in company with his friend M. Gustave de Beaumont, and even then I was more amused with the latter, who had all the fire and gesticulation of a Southerner, while Tocqueville's manner had the sobriety usually characteristic of an Englishman. By this time his book had made a great sensation, and he was received with the warm welcome always accorded in London to recognised literary superiority.

My first visit to Paris was, as I have said, with my parents in 1847, and it was then that I was able to appreciate his delightful conversation and exquisite personality. He gave me the idea of extreme delicacy and refinement. Mrs. Grote used to say of him that he was porcelain all through. From the time of his first introduction, and until his death in 1857, Tocqueville kept up a lively correspondence with my father,* and the two friends met both in France and in England.

In the winter of 1850-51 the Tocquevilles promised to join us in Italy, and the first person we saw when we landed at Naples on a blazing hot day (December 6, it really was as hot as June) was Tocqueville. He and his wife were settled for the winter at Sorrento. She was an Englishwoman, neither rich nor noble, and his family had very much disapproved of the match ; but there never was a happier marriage than their union of twenty-five years.

* Published in 1872. 'Correspondence and Conversations of Alexis de Tocqueville.' (H. S. King and Co.)

Tocqueville frequently came over to Naples to join in our sight-seeing, and he and I went up Vesuvius together. My father and mother remained at the Hermitage, for they would not walk or submit to be carried up the mountain ; but M. de Tocqueville and I started, each led by a guide with a leathern strap over his shoulder, to which we clung, our feet sinking at every step into burning cinders. Every now and then we halted, exhausted, but our guides cried 'Corraggio,' and on we went. My companion confessed afterwards that he was always in hopes of my giving up, but I did not flinch, and we were amply repaid by the glimpse of the infernal regions which we fancied we obtained when we looked down the crater.

On January 25 we joined the Tocquevilles at Sorrento. They and Ampère, who arrived soon afterwards, occupied the second story of the Palazzo Belvedere Guerracino, and the first floor was made ready for us by putting in a fireplace—there had not been one in the house when the Tocquevilles arrived. The Palazzo was beautifully placed half-way up a hill about a mile from Sorrento, and from our loggia and terrace we overlooked the orange-covered plain, the white houses of the town, the sapphire sea, Naples, and the dream-like island of Capri in the distance. The air was so pure that we could almost count the houses in Naples.

Every day we used to make long expeditions on foot and on donkeys over the mountains. 'Sometimes,' Ampère says, writing of this period, 'we halted in some lovely spot, with the sea spread out before us, and the sky of Naples above us. We rested to take breath, and then resumed our conversations. Tocqueville's inexhaustible mind, which at no time displayed more activity or more freedom, touched, without undue haste or too rapid transition, but with even flow and infinite variety, one subject after another. They succeeded each other without effort, from the most important discussions down to the most piquant anecdotes. Though always perfectly simple, he preserved in the most intimate and familiar conversations the purity of expression and admirable choice of words which were a part of his nature. While sitting on the rocks around Sorrento I might have written down—and why did I not?—all that escaped from his lips in those moments of friendly intercourse.'*

Mme. de Tocqueville's health was so uncertain that she seldom was able to join us in these expeditions. Whenever she was well enough she accompanied the two gentlemen in the visit which they paid to us every evening after dinner. Tocqueville was at that time writing his 'Souvenirs,' which were published two years ago. He never intended them to appear in his lifetime, and they consequently contain more personal details concerning himself and his contemporaries than any other of his writings. He describes even peculiarities of gesture, manner, and appearance, and he speaks with the utmost frankness of his own motives and opinions. He was also meditating at Sorrento his great work on the 'Ancien Régime.'

* My father fortunately supplied this omission.

He had given up literary work for politics during the thirteen years, from 1839 to 1852, he sat in the Chamber as deputy from Valognes. Although to the end an Orleanist, he saw clearly the mistakes made by Louis Philippe, and his speech, on January 27, 1848, warned his hearers of the impending Revolution. In the May following he was elected member for La Manche in the new Parliament. He and his friend Gustave de Beaumont (at that time Ambassador in England) used all their influence in favour of General Cavaignac, but after Louis Napoleon was elected President, Tocqueville yielded to his urgent appeal for help, and accepted the portfolio for Foreign Affairs. He retained it until the President plainly showed that his real object was Empire, on which Tocqueville resigned office, but continued to sit in the Legislative Assembly until the coup d'état in December, 1851.* From this time he gave up politics altogether for literature, a field far better suited to his sensitive temperament, and in which he was unrivalled.

He was imprisoned with the other most distinguished members of the Assembly on the evening of

* M. de Tocqueville wrote an interesting account of this event in a letter to Mr. Henry Reeve. It appeared in the Times of December 11, 1851, and is published in his 'Life.' ('Memoir and Remains of Alexis de Tocqueville,' translation published by Macmillan in 1862, vol. ii.)

December 2. Three weeks afterwards he said to Mr. Senior: 'The gayest time I ever passed was in the barrack of the Quai d'Orsay. The élite of France in education, in birth, and in talents, particularly in the talents of society, was collected within the walls of that barrack. A long struggle was over, in which our part had not been timidly played; we had done our duty, we had gone through some perils, and we had some to encounter, and we were all in the high spirits which excitement and danger shared with others, when not too formidable, create. From the courtyard, in which we had been penned for a couple of hours, where the Duc de Broglie and I tore our chicken with our hands and our teeth, we were transferred to a long sort of gallery or garret, a spare dormitory for the soldiers when the better rooms are filled. Those who chose to take the trouble hired palliasses from the soldiers. I was too idle, and lay on the floor in my cloak. Instead of sleeping, we spent the night in shooting from palliasse to palliasse anecdotes, jokes, and pleasantries. C'était un feu roulant une pluie de bons mots.'

The success of the 'Ancien Régime' even surpassed that of the 'Démocratie en Amérique.' On his next visit to London, Tocqueville was received with a perfect ovation; and on his return to France 'the English Admiralty,' he writes to a friend, 'put at my disposal a little steamer which carried me straight from Portsmouth to Cherbourg, to the great astonishment of the natives of the latter place, who, waiting in the hopes of seeing at least a prince land from the vessel, saw only your humble servant.'

After the coup d'état Tocqueville ceased to have a home in Paris. He used to say that he had intervals of sauvagerie, or rather the times when he was not sauvage were the intervals; he easily tired of Paris, and longed to fly to the fields, woods and sea-shore of his native province. He lived there latterly almost entirely, and when he came to Paris he had rooms in the Hôtel Bedford, which we also frequented. Mme. de Tocqueville used to take this opportunity for visiting her aunt. Alexis was therefore dependent upon us for his family life, and he came every evening to tell us what he had been doing. Once I remember he was much elated at having sat next to Georges Sand at some public dinner. He was so little of a Bohemian that he had never seen her before.

In person he was small and delicate. He had very thick and rather long black hair, soft yet brilliant dark eyes, and a finely marked brow. The upper lip was long, and the mouth wide, but sensitive and expressive. His manner was full of kindness and playfulness, and his fellow-countrymen used to say of him that he was a perfect specimen (he belonged to the old noblesse) of the 'Gentilhomme de l'Ancien Régime.' Although he had a keen sense of humour, his countenance was sad in repose. His was an essentially introspective mind, never satisfied with its own achievements. Again and again in his letters to the friends of his early youth, we come upon passages of morbid self-depreciation, combined with a restless craving for perfection and an impatience of doubt. His untranslatable phrase, 'Les opinions ne sont que des points de vue,' has often been quoted. Even his complete domestic happiness, deeply conscious of it as he was, could not still his restlessness. But none of this appeared in his gentle manner and quiet, yet brilliant, conversation. He gave himself no airs of superiority; he united high-bred courtesy with absolute naturalness.

The delicate frame which had endured so much labour and trial suddenly broke down in the autumn of 1858. He was ordered to the South, but deferred going until too late, and he died at Cannes early in 1859, at the age of fifty-three. His life may be summed up in the following reflection found among his papers: 'La vie n'est ni un plaisir ni une douleur, mais une affaire grave dont nous sommes chargé et qu'il faut conduire et terminer à notre honneur.'

It is rather the custom, when a man is exceptionally gifted and charming, to lament his wife's inferiority. Accordingly, many people did not appreciate Mme. de Tocqueville. But she was in reality a worthy helpmeet to her distinguished husband, as he was fully aware, for, writing of her some time after their marriage, he said: '. . . I cannot describe to you the happiness yielded in the long-run by the habitual society of a woman in whose soul all that is good in your own is reflected naturally, and even improved. Not a day passes when I do not thank Heaven for having thrown Marie in my way, or without my thinking that if anything can give happiness on earth it is the possession of such a partner.'

She suffered from very delicate health. She frequently was shut up for weeks in a dark room; her eyes could not bear the light, and at the same time an affection of the throat prevented her speaking. I asked her how she could bear the long hours, and she replied that when she was pretty well she learned pages of her favourite authors by heart and repeated them to herself in illness. We were very much attached to her, and she was particularly kind to us.

Two years after Tocqueville's death my father and I paid a visit to her in Normandy. She had gathered round her three or four intimate friends, M. and Mme. de Beaumont and their son, and Jean Jacques Ampère. The portrait of Alexis de Tocqueville hung over the mantelpiece; we talked continually of him, and he seemed to be still amongst us. How much we wished that we could hear his voice, which, low, sweet, and varied in its tones, added so much to the charm of his conversation!

Although Alexis was the youngest son, the old family château of Tocqueville was left to him, the elder brothers having places of greater size and importance. It was built of granite, the modern part in the time of Louis XIII. The rest is very ancient, especially three round towers; one of them contained two inhabited stories, one room on each. My father occupied the lower and Ampère the upper chamber. The walls were so thick that the temperature never rose above eighty or, we were told, fell below seventy degrees. Another tower contained a wide granite staircase, up which Mme. de Tocqueville told me she rode on her first visit as a bride, her horse led by her husband and brothers-in-law.

The park consists of about thirty acres, and is traversed by a fine avenue leading to the front of the house. To the west the ground rises to a wild common overlooking the sea and a green plain covered with trees and hedgerows, and studded with the picturesque towers and spires of the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries.

Tea or coffee was brought to our rooms about eight, and we were not expected to appear before the half-past eleven o'clock breakfast. We used to drive and walk in the afternoon, meeting, as at Sorrento, on some beautiful spot looking out on the sea, where we sat down and talked, Ampère and Beaumont bearing the chief part in the conversation.

In the evenings Ampère read aloud to us a play of Molière's. It was quite equal to being at the Français, and he kept us in fits of laughter at the 'Bourgeois Gentilhomme.'

There was no one more amusing than Ampère. Tocqueville used to say of him that he had the 'viel esprit français'; he certainly had the old French gaiety. His father, André Ampère,* was a great mathematician. The son's talents lay in a different direction, that of literature. But he was far more eminent as a talker. 'His conversation,' said Mme. Mohl, who was a first-rate judge, 'was like a stream of sparkling water, always fresh, never fatiguing. His wit was so natural that you never thought of anything but the amusement he gave you.' His whole life and character were absolutely French, no Englishman was ever like him. He had an astonishing capacity for friendship, and his friends of both sexes were enough to fill up his life without any nearer tie.

* One of the most charming books of modern times is Mme. Chevreux's 'Memoirs of the Two Ampères.' It was reviewed by Lady Eastlake in the Quarterly.

At the age of twenty he was introduced to Mme. Récamier, then a beautiful woman of forty-three. He attached himself to her court, and for many years made the fourth at her habitual dinner-party; the others were her husband, her father (M. Bernard), and Ballanche. Châteaubriand spent with her every afternoon, and every evening after dinner. He dined always with his wife, which was thought a sufficient sacrifice to conjugal propriety.

‘The most illustrious of our party,’ said Ampère, ‘was Châteaubriand, and the most amusing was Ballanche. My only merit was in being the youngest. The most agreeable period of Châteaubriand’s reign was when he ceased to exact a tête-à-tête, and Ballanche and I were admitted at four o’clock. Châteaubriand was delightful: très en train, très facile à vivre, beaucoup d’imagination et de connaissances.’

‘Facile à vivre!’ exclaimed my father. ‘I thought that his vanity was very exacting.’

‘As a public man,’ replied Ampère, ‘and in general society; but in intimate society, when he was no longer posing, he was charming. Later in the evening came Miss Clark’ (Mme. Mohl). ‘Châteaubriand, always subject to ennui, delighted in her. Later on in Mme. Récamier’s life, when she had become blind, and Châteaubriand deaf, and Ballanche infirm, the evenings were very sad. I had to try to amuse persons who had become almost unamusable.’

In the early days Mme. Récamier had a niece living with her, afterwards Mme. Lenormand. A friend suggested that something might be going on between the young people. Mme. Récamier one day hinted this suggestion to Ampère. He hid his face in his hands and burst into tears. At last he exclaimed, 'Ce n'est pas elle!'

Mme. Chevreux's book abounds in amusing stories of the elder Ampère's absence of mind. In this respect his son was like him, and in a total disregard of money, comfort, and appearance. In early days he lived with Julius Mohl in the Rue de Grenelle; his affairs were always in the greatest confusion, but his companion took care of them and set them to rights. The concierge and his wife, M. and Mme. Félix, made a great pet of Ampère, and when he was ill used to send him up every day a tisane of a different colour 'to amuse him.' M. Félix was a character. He had been in the army, and was fond of recounting his adventures. M. Mohl wove them into a narrative, and read it aloud to the old man, who was so moved by the recital of his own deeds that he burst into tears.

After Mme. Récamier's death, Ampère, for love of her, devoted himself to Chateaubriand, visited him every day, wrote for him—in short, became his slave. He left the Hôtel Garni in which he lived, sold most of his books, did not even choose which were to be kept, but left everything to his friends. 'I suppose,' wrote Mme. Mohl, 'he will go on wandering till he settles at Rome or dies somewhere in an inn. He attached himself to Mme. Récamier for the twenty best years of his life, and now she is gone he is like a bird on the branch. However, he seems quite happy and contented.' Another interest was in store for him. In his travels in Italy he met M. and Mme. Chevreux (the distinguished chemist). They were taking their daughter, Mme. Gueymard, who was attacked by consumption, to the south. She was a charming young woman. Ampère became as much attached to her as he had been to Mme. Récamier, and after her death he was equally devoted to her parents. Henceforth, when not travelling, their beautiful château, Stors, in the Ile Adam—before the Revolution the splendid abode of the Prince de Conti—became his home. Every year, on the anniversary of her death, wherever he might be, he had a mass said for Mme. Gueymard. M. de Corcelle, at that time French Ambassador to the Vatican, told me that six years afterwards, when they were both in Rome, he was invited to be present, and he saw poor Ampère kneeling in a corner of the church in floods of tears.

The name best known in England of all our foreign friends is, I suppose, that of Guizot. My father was acquainted with him when he was Ambassador to our Court in 1840, but I do not recollect him until he came to England as an exile in 1848. The feeling against him in Paris at that time was so strong that he barely escaped with his life. His children had preceded him, under the care of his aged mother. She was a grand old lady.* Her husband's head fell on the scaffold in 1792, and at the age of eighty-six she lived through another revolution. Once more she heard the tocsin, the terrible 'Ça ira,' and the cries of the populace, this time demanding the head of her son. The fatigue and anxiety were too much for her, and she died within a fortnight of reaching London.

* She is immortalised by St. Beuve in one of his Causeries.

No wonder the respectable classes in France are afraid of revolution—the Red Spectre—for its horrors touch them very nearly. Of the people written of in these few pages, all had suffered in those nearest and dearest to them. The Comte de Tocqueville (father of Alexis) narrowly escaped the guillotine in 1793, when he was imprisoned for nine months, with six members of his family, and saw them all leave the prison in one afternoon for trial, judgment and execution. His own trial was fixed for the 10th Thermidor, but fortunately Robespierre fell on the 9th. He had accustomed himself to spend part of the afternoon—from three to four, when the victims were summoned—in sleep; but the tension turned his hair white, although he was under twenty.

Mme. de Beaumont was a grand-daughter of Lafayette. Her great-great-grandmother, her great-grandmother, and great-aunt (marriages were very early in those times: the great-aunt was only twenty-four and the great-great-grandmother ninety), were all guillotined on the same day. The head of Ampère's grandfather fell on the scaffold, and a similar fate, as I have said, befell the father of Guizot.* The memoirs published by the great statesman during his lifetime give a voluminous account of his public life, but they convey an erroneous impression of his personality. He felt this keenly, for in a letter respecting an article on the book by Ernest Renan, he wrote, 'Renan makes me out to be the same stiff, tragical, solitary person that will end by becoming legendary and as false as any other legend.' Nothing could be more untrue; nothing could be more open and friendly than his manner, which at once set his most insignificant visitor at ease. His voice was in itself a cordial, it was so full of hope, and neither age nor infirmity ever dimmed the brightness of his eye or the vivacity of his mind.

* My father's journals abound in conversations with Guizot, but, as he was still alive when they were published, I did not venture to put his name, for which I substituted the letter Z.

Although during the last years of Louis Philippe's reign Tocqueville and Guizot were on opposite sides, the younger politician never failed to appreciate the elder. 'Guizot,' I heard him say, 'is always charming. He has an aplomb, an ease and a verve arising from his security that whatever he says will interest and amuse. He is a perfect specimen of an ex-statesman, homme de lettres and père de famille, falling back on literature and the domestic affections.' And again, in a letter to my father, apropos of a visit to Sir John Boileau: 'You saw there M. Guizot in one of his best lights. The energy with which he stands up under the pressure of age and ill-fortune, and is not only resigned, but as vigorous, as animated, and as cheerful as ever, shows a character admirably well tempered, and a dignity which nothing can impair.'

After the death of Mme. Guizot the family consisted of M. Guizot, his two young daughters, his son Guillaume, and Mlle. Chabot, a great friend of the grandmother's. They lived in a little house in Pelham Crescent, Brompton, at that time much more out of the way than it is now, and bore their reverses with the utmost simplicity and cheerfulness. Society made much of them, as it did of the rest of the brilliant little band of emigrants who greatly enlivened London during their exile — Dumon, Rémusat, Marochetti, Azeglio, and many others. Perhaps the most sparkling converser was Dumon, Minister of Finance under Louis Philippe. We saw a great deal of all of them. They often came to our late breakfast, and, uninvited, would drop in after dinner in the evening. The summer was unusually cold and wet, and when Guillaume Guizot went back to Paris, and his friends asked him what he was going to do, he replied, 'Me sécher.'

In August, 1860, my father and I spent ten days with M. Guizot at his country house, Val Richer, near Lisieux, in Normandy. It had been an ancient monastery. M. Guizot saw it soon after the death of his second wife, and it was put in order and arranged by the son of his first marriage, François, who did not live to see it completed. Although it was full of sad and tender recollections, M. Guizot liked it better than any other place. He lived there in patriarchal fashion, surrounded by his children and grandchildren, and waited upon by his old servants and their descendants. He also gave an asylum to the aunt of his two sons-in-law, Conrad and Cornellis de Witt. (The two brothers married Henriette and Pauline Guizot.) His deference to the old lady was beautiful; he always gave her his arm when she entered and left the room, and took her in to dinner before anyone else.

The possibility of different generations living together under one roof is partly, I think, owing to French habits. The women of the family do not think it necessary to sit together; every bedroom has its cabinet de toilette, and is more like a sitting-room than a bedroom. The arrangement, however, is not always blissful, for a friend of mine who was dining in a French house expressed his admiration of the system to the daughter-in-law, his neighbour, whereupon the young lady turned upon him a pair of very sparkling black eyes, and hissed out between her teeth, 'C'est une vie d'enfer.'

This must have been an exception, for the tie between parent and child is certainly stronger in France than in England, and even when not very congenial, public opinion imposes filial devotion as a duty. Little children live much more with their parents than usually in England. They appeared at Val Richer, as in every other house I have visited in France, at every meal, and were extremely well behaved, and never obtrusive. It always distressed me that they were allowed, almost compelled, to sit up late. I have seen them lying asleep on the sofas, and when roused imploring to be sent to bed, which was granted as a favour.

The sitting-rooms at Val Richer, as at Tocqueville, occupied the whole breadth of the house. There was no passage, and they all opened into each other. Our second breakfast was at half-past eleven. At three there was a sort of luncheon of cake and fruit, and then we used to go out for long walks. M. Guizot always offered me his arm, and I felt obliged to take it, although it was somewhat embarrassing as we plodded along the country lanes and paths, M. Guizot talking all the time most agreeably.

Normandy is very like England—green and cultivated, with high, wide hedgerows and old trees. On Sunday, as there was no Protestant church, Mme. Pauline de Witt read prayers, after which Guizot read us quite admirably a fine sermon of Bourdaloue. In the evening the young people danced. One rainy day Mme. de Witt brought out her father's orders to amuse us—the Golden Fleece, the Elephant, and a Chinese order. The last was the grandest; the owner wears a blue button, and ranks next after the Emperor. Guizot's collar of the Golden Fleece was the one worn by Philip II. of Spain. Queen Christina wished to make him Duke of San Antonio as a reward for the Spanish marriages; when he refused she sent him a fine Murillo. In talking to us, he did not appear to think that any blame attached to that iniquitous transaction.

He was a most delightful host. My father concludes his record of our visit in these words: 'M. Guizot is never greater or more amiable than in his own family.'

In a letter of condolence on the death of my uncle Colonel Senior, 'in 1861, he wrote to my father: 'Personne ne sait mieux que moi ce que sont les douleurs de la famille. J'ai connu en ce genre tout ce qu'on peut connaître de joie et de tristesse.' He lost his first wife in 1827, and his second in 1833. They were both of them very distinguished women, and he was tenderly attached to them. His only child by his first marriage, on whom he counted to take charge of his little motherless children should they also be deprived of their father, died in 1837.

Besides all these family sorrows, M. Guizot paid the penalty of a long life in the loss of almost all his contemporaries and early friends. 'I am weary of seeing my friends die,' he said by the open grave of Herbet, in 1867.

A last sad blow was to fall on him. His daughter, Pauline, would not leave her husband, and they were shut up in Paris during the siege. She never recovered from the grief and privations of that time, and died three years afterwards. Six days after that event Mme. Mohl visited him. 'His power of work,' she wrote, 'goes on, and that is his salut. He wishes ardently to finish his "History of France." It is very touching to see the old man of eighty-seven working so hard. When I saw him he was at his desk, as busy as possible. Alluding to his age, he said death was but a short separation.' It was indeed short, for in six months he followed her.

He was a sincere Christian. A few days before his death he said to his daughter, 'Ah, my child, how little do we know!' Then, suddenly lifting up his hands, he exclaimed: 'However, I shall soon enter into the light.*' And when he bid his children good-bye for the last time, and his daughter cried, 'We shall meet again, my father,' he replied, 'No one is more convinced of that than I am.'

* Goethe's last words were, 'More light!'

CHAPTER V.

THREE DISTINGUISHED LADIES.

MRS. GROTE, the wife of George Grote, the historian, and a no less remarkable personage, was one of our earliest and most intimate friends; we lived in the same circle, both in London and in Paris.

In speaking of Archbishop Whately I said that in many respects he resembled Dr. Johnson; it also constantly struck me that Queen Elizabeth lived again in Mrs. Grote. They both had extraordinary and versatile abilities, strong affections, a great power of ruling, and, withal, not a little vanity. I think one liked Mrs. Grote all the better for this vanity; it seemed to render her more individual, more human, and to temper the awe she would otherwise have inspired. She had sufficient reason to estimate highly her moral and intellectual qualities, but I believe she set more value on her small foot and Vandyke hand than on any other of her gifts.

She was tall and stately, but not graceful; her movements were angular and masculine. When first I knew her she was no longer young, but she retained to the last her luminous blue eyes and her delicate complexion. Her features were small and regular.

Her dress was characteristic ; it did not change with the fashion. She always wore short skirts, no crinoline, white stockings, and high shoes ; in the summer a print dress (she found fault with me one chilly morning for appearing in black silk—‘ So stuffy, my dear ’), long white cambric cuffs trimmed with narrow lace, a collar to match, and a white muslin apron completed her morning costume. It was always scrupulously fresh and clean. In the evening she dressed handsomely, but equally independently of change. She generally wore a sort of head-dress she called a ‘toque,’ and was partial to red shoes, which she said were admired by Sydney Smith.

Her ringing laugh and clear contralto voice added much to the charm of her stimulating conversation. She saw the fun, the humorous side, as well as the pathos, of every phase of human life. She was, as she said of herself, ‘a good affliction woman,’ and she entered as heartily into the joys as into the sorrows of her friends.

It would be impossible to give an idea of the sparkle and originality of her talk ; its wit and raciness made a piquant contrast with her somewhat formal old-fashioned manner. In her published writings, though full of excellent sense, expressed in downright nervous English, the fun seems to have evaporated, but some of her familiar letters are less serious and more like her real self.

She had a deep and true affection for my father ; he often took me to see her in the morning, and when he was going away she would say, ‘ Can’t you leave M—— to play with me ? ’ Soon I began to visit her alone, and generally found her at a very late breakfast, for she suffered terribly from neuralgia, and had very bad nights. She used to say to her butler, with stately formality, 'Well, Mr. de Königs, what have you got for me?' and he would produce some dainty dish to tempt her appetite. On one occasion in Eccleston Place, Mendelssohn was present, and I had the immense delight of hearing him play. On another morning she said, 'I have got Jenny Lind here, but she will not let you or anyone see her.' This was before the Swedish nightingale had enchanted London. Later on I had the great pleasure of hearing the first performance of the 'Elijah,' conducted by Mendelssohn and sung by Jenny Lind.

Mrs. Grote was absolutely unconventional. One afternoon, when my sister-in-law Jeanie Senior and I went to call on her, she proposed to take us for a drive in her buggy. She put on a gray hat with a green feather and a long green veil. There were only two seats, so Jeanie had to cling on as best she might, and in this style we dashed, Mrs. Grote driving, down Bond Street, and all round the crowded Park. We were in high glee; but Mrs. Grote remarked on the ill-breeding of the English, for 'they would stare.' It never occurred to her that there was anything to stare at.

I went often to stay with her in the country, first at Burnham Beeches. These visits were delightful, especially when I had Mrs. Grote to myself, for she would pour out her shrewd reflections and curious stories of people and things with complete unreserve. She seemed no older than I was, and sometimes we indulged in real rollicking fun. One evening, in the little house she built when she left Burnham, 'History Hut,' she read to me two little memoirs she had written on Jenny Lind and Fanny Ellsler, and suddenly she jumped up, and, seizing a bronze ewer which was on the table, performed one of Fanny Ellsler's character dances. We were so excited that we did not go upstairs till three o'clock, and then she followed me into my room and we had some more representations.

There was nothing that she could not do. She was especially proud of her business talents, and, in order to set her husband free to work at his History, she undertook the chief management of their property. In a letter to me from their estate, Long Bennington, in Lincolnshire, she describes her diligent supervision and the 'boredom' of the historian.

'I only slept Sunday in Savile Row, starting next day for this place, where we have been ever since hard at work, hearing grievances at every turn, dealing with demands for repairs and improvements, and persecuted by unrelenting bad weather. I have been from three to four hours on horseback, most days under umbrella and cloak, taking surveys of our various dominions, which lie three miles apart in some cases, the ground being too wet to allow of my walking, except on Tuesday, when I passed three hours in walking through glorious wheatfields, mangolds, rich pastures studded with beasts, and the like. For a little estate of this character, it is incredible what a quantity of matter arises for adjustment as between landlord and tenant, stewards and tenants inclusive. . . . We are putting in a new wheel to our watermill, at a cost of £150, begad! which does not help to make us gay under the dolorous atmospheric conditions. The historian, who just now is figuring as the squire, is longing to escape from the cares of government, and to get back to Aristotle. Meanwhile, he has Humboldt's "Cosmos" with him, which ever and anon is drawn forth from pocket, as other men light their cigars, to soothe his vexed spirit withal. . . . If you and Mr. Senior want to see us, as I take it for granted you must, I am open to an offer in the week after next.'

She understood the practical part of farming as well as superintending; once, when my sister-in-law and I were at History Hut, she drove a plough half round the field—no easy matter, as I can vouch, for I failed ignominiously in the endeavour. On this occasion we resumed our drives in the buggy in the same dashing style as in Bond Street, but with fewer spectators. She also used to set us to play bowls, in which she was a proficient. She sketched and painted up to a late period, she played Beethoven, Mozart, and Mendelssohn. When she was eighty-four we heard her play, with admirable precision, the piano part in a trio of Beethoven's, at a concert she gave in Savile Row, and, what was very unusual in those days, she performed on the violoncello as well as on the piano. I never, however, heard her play upon it except when we were tête-à-tête. She gave charming musical parties (no wonder, as she could command the best talent of the time—Mendelssohn and Jenny Lind, and others) as well as dinners (the dinner was always carved on the table), and now and then a dance, or 'shake-leg,' as she called it, for the young people. Backgammon and whist were great resources in her declining years. Hayward, Dr. W. Smith, and Mme. du Quaire frequently dropped in to play in Savile Row. It was very trying when Hayward was there, for he was equally angry with bad play, whether on the part of his partner or his antagonist.

In the winter of 1849 my father suffered severely from bronchitis, and was confined to the house. Our evenings were often enlivened by Mrs. Grote, Mrs. Marcet, and a few others. My father always detested all games except chess, and did not know one card from another; but Mrs. Grote insisted on teaching him whist, and we had great fun. He always would arrange his suits on his fingers for the edification of the company. There was not much play, but all the more merriment, and when towards the end of each hand my father exclaimed, 'What are trumps?' the room rang with our shouts of laughter.

Mrs. Marcet* was a charming old lady; her 'Willy's Seasons' is the best of children's books. She must have been eighty at the time of which I am speaking. No one, however, was so amusing, so full of fun and high spirits, as Mrs. Grote. The evening used to close with what she called 'the master's hospitality'—a bottle of seltzer water—which was the signal for renewed hilarity.

* She was a Swiss, widow of Dr. Marcet, sister of M. Haldimand. She and her family are often mentioned in Miss Edgeworth's and Miss Berry's 'Memoirs.'

Besides her other accomplishments, Mrs. Grote was an enthusiastic housekeeper, very kind to her servants, helping them and sympathizing with them in all difficulties, although she sometimes used strong language to them. Indeed, her language was often strong, and had the unreserve of a former generation. She did not hesitate to call a spade a spade. Among other old fashions, she used, in the winter, to brew some excellent punch in a beautiful china bowl, which, with packs of cards, was passed on to the servants to make merry. Frederika Bremer, who was a personal friend, attempted, in her novel 'The Neighbours,' to draw her portrait as 'Ma chère mère,' and the picture is not unlike the original.

She took as much interest in foreign as in domestic politics, and, like my father, had almost as many friends on the Continent as in England. In a letter written in 1849 she reproaches him with want of sympathy with the French conduct of affairs :

'DEAR MASTER,

'By all means send me the proofs of your article on Lamartine.* I said that you habitually spoke of the authors of the upset of Louis Philippe's throne as if they were "The French," and stigmatized them accordingly as being devoid of political foresight, victims of personal dislike, of which they had paid the just penalty in the unsettled impoverishing sequel, etc. In fact, your tone in speaking of them always has struck me as pitched in the key of the ancient fable of "King Log and the Frogs." Well, we can't discuss on paper—more's the pity!—nor quarrel. Where you and I branch off in politics is where you take the line of abolishing all the sanction attendant on the agency of the masses. You are for striding along your own gait, under, it is true, the consciousness of obligation; but you never seem to me to provide any apparatus for enforcing this sense of obligation. I lament, as you do, the absence of a sagacious and well-judging public in France; but, as no Government has ever challenged the approbation of such a public, one cannot be angry that the sentiment of attachment should be awaiting. Remains, the sanction of a half-instructed public, whose passions are the source of its impulses more than in most nations. Therefore, the rulers of the French are bound to ménager those passions, or to suffer by their imprudent dealings. Guizot exasperated them, and paid for it. . . .

* Published in 'Journals in France and Italy.'

'Are you not glad of the dénouement at Rome? How it reminds me of Bob Acres and Sir Lucius in "The Rivals"!

"Sir L. : And if he did do so, Mr. Acres, well, sir, what would you say to him? [i.e., Pio Nono].

"Acres [collecting himself, and dropping the hoity-toity altogether]: Why, Sir Lucius, I should tell him I thought him a mighty uncivil gentleman."

'The part of Acres by Louis Napoleon; but not, we might subjoin, for this occasion only. The part fits him obviously, and he will repeat it.

'As to our seventh volume,* it is all printed. It is deeply interesting; but Gramminy! how he does pique, repique, and capot old Mitford! and how t'other side of the picture comes out! The whole volume is story and instructive commentary on story.'

* Grote's 'History of Greece.'

She wrote to my father, in answer to a letter from him, describing the very interesting meetings of the members of the Education Commission in a lighter vein :

'BARROW GREEN, SURREY.

'DEAR MASTER,

'Received yours yesterday. Cannot say how thankful I felt to be 100 miles away! What incredible ennui should I not have been subjected to had it been my hard fate to fall amongst Poor Law adepts! Your enumeration of the quorum which assembles round Minnie's black decoction of an evening quite gave me a qualm of aversion. You only needed Chadwick to be au complet. What does poor — do for a living amidst the hubbub of dietaries, percentages, statistic calculations, schedules, and various districts' expenditure and the like, and you all taking a malicious pleasure in stifling all other talk on the specious plea of "public utility" and "vital questions," and similar professional formulæ? Well, I thank my stars that my ears have been regaled with other sounds of late, we having had a visit from Jenny* and spouse, who drove over in their own carriage and stayed a couple of days here. I had my Swedish nephew (Von Koch), and my English nephew (Lewin) to play with her, and she was as happy as a queen, sitting out of doors all forenoons, stitching, and riding to and from Marden Park with her young and attractive countryman, we all in britska in attendance. She is in good trim, and sang charmingly all the evening quantities of Swedish songs, to Von Koch's delight, who also joined himself in the national airs. Best regards from my good man concludes me,

* Mme. Lind Goldschmidt.

'Dear Master,

'Most truly and affectionately,

'H. GROTE.'

She kept up long correspondences with her foreign friends, among whom the principal were Faucher, Circourt, Lavergne, Bunsen, and, above all, Tocqueville. A great many of his letters to her appeared in the 'Memoirs and Remains.' Her memory was extraordinarily retentive. On one of the last visits I paid to her, not long before her death, she went through all the changes of Ministry in France since 1851.

She delighted in all the accessories of country life, and latterly lived almost entirely at the Ridgway, Shere, a commonplace villa which she bought and finished according to her fancy. She used to say, 'Grote and I built this house when we were seventy, and we have never regretted it.'*

In her memoir of her husband she gives an amusing and interesting description of her early life, courtship and marriage. She had the greatest admiration and veneration for Mr. Grote. He was tall and handsome, altogether what she called a 'personable' man. She said that 'no sculptor or painter had ever been able to give the mingled sweetness and majesty of Grote's countenance.' His gentleness and stately courtesy were very attractive in such a distinguished scholar. Like his wife, he retained the dress of earlier days, and was always carefully brushed up and attired in glossy broadcloth. His coat was often brown, and he was never without a jabot—a finely-crimped shirt-frill, trimmed with narrow lace; no boots in the house, but pumps and silk stockings. To him she owed her intellectual cultivation—the ability was always there—and after their marriage her husband set to work to supply the defects in her education.

* She would have been pleased if she had known that her friends the Arthur Russells became the next owners and greatly improved and embellished it.

She gave away readily money, advice and sympathy to the poor, but she greatly disapproved of the lavish, indiscriminate almsgiving to unworthy objects advocated by many well-meaning persons and societies. Her article on the 'Case of the Rich against the Poor' is about the best of her essays.* Her friends in her own station felt sure of her help and sympathy. If they got into any difficulty, it was safe to turn to Mrs. Grote, and she liked her friends, whether in the wrong or the right, all the better for appealing to her. She revelled in a love affair, and always sided with the young. 'Keep the heart warm,' she used to say.

She had all sorts of original expressions and names for her friends. Sir George Cornwall Lewis was 'Fish,' on account of his cold manner; another friend was 'Puffendorf'; a subservient wife was a 'door-mat'; an amateur lady companion a 'dab.' I had the honour of being one of these 'dabs.' In 1855 I attended her in this capacity on a tour of visits in the North. She suffered greatly from the railway, and chuckled much over the idea that we took a week to get to Settle in Yorkshire. Three days of that time were far from entertaining, for she was laid up at Rugby with one of her violent headaches, in bed, and taking morphine to allay the pain. When this was over we amused ourselves vastly in Northumberland, at the Lakes, and finally at the Belpers', where we met my father and Mr. Grote.

* See 'Collected Papers,' by Mrs. Grote.

She had a strong sense of duty and of family obligation, although she was impatient of twaddle, and thought self-sacrifice might be carried to excess. She wrote of a charming young friend: 'Give my love to J., whose sense of duty must always command encomiums, and sympathy for the wearisome cost. I have Charlotte Brontë in my thoughts when I think of J.'s devotion. Still, the figure of "Duty" with J.'s face at the top is not the scare-crow it appears with Charlotte Brontë's on the title-page. Did ever mortal render the idea of conscientious sacrifice so unattractive and unedifying! I think the father must have asked himself at odd moments how his poor children came to let him ride "Juggernaut-wise" over their souls and bodies. I long so to review the book; but no review will ever take sense and reason, or anything in fact, if it be not to the conventional pattern, and I will not write commonplace twaddle; so good-bye, dear child.'

Part of her charm was her self-confidence. She felt as sure as a queen of giving pleasure, and had always the command of her faculties. She did not spare her dearest friends; she told them freely of their faults, and expressed her opinion without reticence ; but she liked them to stand up to her, and had no pleasure in crushing an abject sufferer. She was one of the few people who succeeded in snubbing Monckton Milnes, in whom, however, she delighted, as we all did. She gave a party from nine to eleven, and Milnes (the 'cool of the evening' as he was called by Sydney Smith) chose to come after eleven ; so she stood at the top of the staircase and forbade him to come up.

Mrs. Procter, however, would not submit tamely to a rebuff. On one occasion when she asked for a subscription, Mrs. Grote, who was as open-handed as possible, but chose to give where she listed, refused the application. 'There is a coolness between me and Mrs. Grote,' Mrs. Procter told me, 'that is, if there can be a coolness between two such ladies.'

Mrs. Grote felt the estrangement very keenly, and consulted Dean Stanley as to what she should do. 'Send her a valentine,' said the Dean.* So Mrs. Grote sent her a poetical valentine, and the breach was healed. It was thoroughly healed, for the two ladies met by chance one day in our drawing-room, and were equally cordial and entertaining.

As happens to all who live to a great age, Mrs. Grote's latter years were saddened by the deaths of almost all her contemporaries and many of her juniors, and, more than all besides, by the loss of her beloved and revered husband. But time and sorrow made her only more tender and lenient. To the last she was surrounded by loving friends, anxious to claim her advice and sympathy. Her old 'dabs' were almost all married and unavailable, but she found in her niece, Miss Jessie Lewin, a compensation for those who were gone. No companion ever suited her so perfectly; and while regretting her irreparable loss, Miss Lewin must find comfort in reflecting that she was the prop and consolation of her aunt's declining years.

* Dean Stanley himself told me this. I have seen a different version of the story.

Mrs. Grote died on December 29, 1878, in the eighty-seventh year of her age, and was buried in the beautiful churchyard of Shere, that loveliest of English villages, set in the midst of parks and commons, shady lanes and gorse-covered heaths.

Although I think that no country can beat that of Shere and its neighbourhood in its way, Mrs. Grote's house at Burnham, taken altogether—house, garden, and country—was preferable to any of her other country abodes. The garden was delightfully old-fashioned; a broad gravel walk, with a border on each side, full of hollyhocks, roses, carnations, sweet peas, and other common flowers divided it, and led up to a large summer-house. It was bounding up this walk, pretending to beat a drum and singing the 'rataplan' refrain from the 'Figlia del Reggimento,' that I first saw Jenny Lind. Mrs. Grote's sister, Mme. von Koch, married to a Swede, and living in Stockholm, was one of the singer's earliest and kindest friends—hence the intimacy between her and the Grotes.

No one could see Jenny Lind and not fall under the charm of her perfect naturalness, freshness, and originality. Although her features were irregular, she was anything but plain ; her complexion was fair, she had abundant flaxen hair, and the most wonderful gray eyes, a beautiful figure, hands, and arms, and graceful movements. Hers was not the slow, sinuous grace which has a charm of its own : her movements were light, decided, and expressive. She always seemed to do everything more quickly than anyone else.

At this time she was studying the part of Susanna—a 'sweet part' she said it was—and had the partition of the 'Nozze' almost always on her knee. In the evening she sang her Swedish songs, and then we all went out to listen to the nightingales singing under the old beeches. She had a passion for the song of these 'little sisters' of hers, and used to mimic them and excite their rivalry, so that the air was filled with music.

It was strange that it should have been the fate of my father, who was entirely destitute of musical sense, to be of use to the most celebrated singer of the day. It was in 1849 ; she had resolved to give up the stage, and had affianced herself to Mr. Claudius Harris, a young Indian officer, brother to Mrs. Joseph Grote. My mother and I had just returned from a drive one cold afternoon in April ; I found in the hall a note from Mlle. Lind, asking me to beg my father to call on her next day to meet her trustees about her marriage settlements, either at 3 p.m. or, if that were not possible, at 9 a.m. It so happened that he was not free at three, so he went to her at nine. She did not expect him, and was quite alone. They entered at once upon business, and my father soon found out that she was very half-hearted about the matter altogether ; indeed, she could scarcely have found a partner less suited to her. Mr. Harris and his family had very strict opinions, and they thought that the remainder of the great prima donna's life could not be more appropriately spent than in atoning for her theatrical career. The attraction to Jenny Lind was in her lover's goodness. She said he had such a 'pure mind.'

The Stanleys supported her in her resolution to give up the stage, and so, indeed, did Mrs. Grote from a different reason, for, in spite of her intense sympathy with her young friend's artistic career, she saw that the strain was too great. Jenny Lind was worn out with fatigue and emotion. She threw herself into every part, and suffered herself the woes of the heroine—unlike other great actors and actresses, who, with the exception of the charming Italian actress, Mme. Dusé, succeed in making their representations to a certain degree mechanical. But Jenny Lind's essentially truthful spirit could not do this. The tears she wept in 'La Sonnambula' came from her heart. We had more than once the stage-box, and could see that she was almost overpowered by her feelings. This was even more striking in the 'Lucia,' when the scene in which she renounces Arturo reminded her of a passage in her own life.

She had led this trying and exciting life for nearly twenty years, and she longed for rest and the peace and regularity of a home. The manager of Her Majesty's Theatre, Mr. Lumley, was in despair. It was almost ruin to him to lose her, and he urged her to give him at least a few farewell performances. She offered instead a series of dramatic concerts : only one took place. Although the 'Flauto Magico,' which was chosen for the first performance, would seem to be independent of acting (the libretto is so eminently stupid and undramatic), yet, in spite of Jenny Lind's splendid singing, the whole affair fell flat, to her great disappointment. Never before had she met with a cold reception. Mrs. Grote and Lumley entreated her to give the operatic performances, but she would not yield. At length my father succeeded where they failed. He suggested that Mr. Harris could not object if he really loved her ; he urged the unfairness of disappointing Lumley ; and, finally, the unsatisfactory termination which a failure would put to her whole career. So she promised to give six farewell nights. Lumley was overjoyed, and sent us boxes for all six. The enthusiasm of the audience knew no bounds. Yet no one could believe that the singer, in the very plenitude of her powers (she was only twenty-eight), really intended these to be the last of her triumphs ; but it was so, and after the curtain fell on the last of the six she never appeared again on any stage.

Mr. Harris had consented to these performances, and he and Mlle. Lind were once more on good terms. She lived in a little house very near us, called Clairville Cottage ; it was covered with roses and creepers, had a pretty garden, and was thoroughly rural. The backs of the houses in Brechin Place now occupy the ground. She and Claudius Harris often accompanied us in our country rides : in those happy days the country began at Hogmore Lane, now Gloucester Road, and continued right into Surrey.

Lord Lansdowne sometimes joined us, and also came to meet them at dinner; but we did not venture to invite anyone else at that time, except the Grotes and one or two of Jenny Lind's most intimate friends.

All seemed to be going on swimmingly, and Mrs. Grote went off to Paris, followed soon after by my father; but before he went he said to Mlle. Lind, 'Something tells me that your marriage will not take place. If it should be broken off again, write no letters, and have no farewell interviews, but join Mrs. Grote in Paris immediately.'

Affairs had not been going on so smoothly as appeared. Mr. Harris had asked Jenny Lind to insert in the settlements a promise that she would never act again. To this my father objected, and he also insisted that she should have uncontrolled power over her earnings. Mr. Harris said this was unscriptural, and the engagement was nearly broken off, but renewed in consequence of the despair Mr. Harris exhibited. Not long after Mr. Senior reached Paris there was a tap at the door of Mrs. Grote's apartment one evening about seven o'clock, and in came Jenny. The ill-assorted marriage was finally broken off.

The emotions of the last few months had told heavily upon Mlle. Lind, but with the sense of freedom the power of enjoyment returned, and she rode in the Bois de Boulogne, walked on the Boulevards and in the Tuileries, and listened to the nightingales.

One day she took my father to a house in the Square d'Orléans, near the Rue St. Lazare. It was built round a courtyard, with a fountain in the middle. Jenny gazed at it without speaking. Afterwards she said, 'I was so miserable in that house; I envied the fountain because it was not obliged to sing.' The house had been the residence of Manuel Garcia, the most celebrated master of singing in Europe, and she alluded to the time when, in despair at the loss of her voice from fatigue and bad management, she slowly regained it by means, first of rest, and then by skilful practice under Garcia's teaching.

The domestic happiness for which she had so long sighed was soon to be hers. After singing in concerts and oratorios in Germany, Sweden, and Liverpool, she sailed for the United States on August 21, 1850. Her success in the New World was as brilliant as it had been in the Old, and her charities as munificent. Her company was joined in 1851 by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, who succeeded Benedict as pianist. A deep and true attachment sprang up between the two young artists, and they were married on February 5, 1852.

She did not give up the use of her splendid gift; she continued to sing at concerts both in England and on the Continent. She ultimately fixed her home in England, and, I am happy to say, we never lost sight of her. I find recorded a dinner at 13, Hyde Park Gate, when the guests were M. and Mme. Lind Goldschmidt, Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, Mme. Mohl, Mrs. Norton, Mme. Ristori and her husband the Marquis Capranica, Thackeray, and Lord Lansdowne. Thackeray said that he had never seen so strong a cast.

Her horror of being lionized led her sometimes to reject overtures which were made in perfectly good faith to express the respect and admiration felt for her; hence she was not always popular.

She delighted in giving children's parties. I remember one in 1865, at her house in Wimbledon, and her joyous participation in the amusement she provided; and again in Moreton Gardens, when she waltzed like a girl with her eldest son. The last time I heard her sing was at a concert she gave at her own house in 1880 for the Prince of Sweden.* She had become very nervous about her voice, and it was not certain whether in the end she would summon up courage to sing. At last she yielded to the persuasion of her friends, and sang the splendid cantata, with violin accompaniment, from Mozart's 'Re Pastore.' It was a thing to remember for the rest of one's life.

In her latter years she took a little house called Windspoint, which she arranged and improved until it resembled a Swiss cottage, on the top of the hills above Malvern Wells. On one side lay Herefordshire, tossed about in hill and dale, and on the other side the rich plain of Worcestershire, dotted over with spires and towers, and intersected by the silver Severn. We had in the summer of 1884 a house just below hers, and we saw her much more frequently than is possible in the turmoil of London. We often used to sit with her in her garden, enjoying the magnificent view. She was always uneasy lest she should be stared at, and if any presumptuous wight peeped in at the gate, she would instantly shoot open a large red umbrella and shelter herself beneath it. My daughter Gaynor, who is devoted to music, frequently went to see her alone, and one day ventured to ask her to write her name in her birthday-book. They were in the drawing-room. Jenny Lind rose up, saying, 'Well, I did not think you had been a commonplace person,' and walked through the open window into the garden, leaving my daughter to repent her indiscretion. Presently her hostess came back and gave her a beautiful rose, and went on talking as if there had been no pause, and when Gaynor was taking leave Mme. Goldschmidt said, quite cheerfully, 'Now, where is your birthday-book?' and wrote her name in it. It must have cost her more than many an apparently greater sacrifice.

* Now King Oscar.

I like to think of her as she stood in the hanging balcony of her cottage, waving good-bye to us, the sun setting behind her picturesque figure.

It was at Windspoint that she died, in 1887. 'At the very close of her life, as she lay in weakness and misery, her daughter opened the shutters and let in the morning sun; she just let her lips shape the first bars of the song she loved: "An den lieben Sonnenschein." They were the last notes she sang on earth.*'

The retirement of Jenny Lind proved nearly the ruin of the manager of Her Majesty's Opera but he was fortunate enough to secure for the next season the well-known prima donna, Mlle. Sontag (at that time Countess Rossi), who, having lost her fortune, had recently returned to the stage. She was still beautiful, and the sweetness of her voice and the perfection of her singing were still unimpaired, but she had not the genius and dramatic fire of Jenny Lind. However, all London flocked to hear their old favourite, and the number of bald and white heads seen in the stalls

* 'Jenny Lind the Artist,' by Canon Scott Holland.

(survivors of the day when she and Pasta used to electrify the world in 'Otello') was extraordinary.

One day Mrs. Grote invited the whole corps of the Opera to Burnham Beeches. She was so kind as to ask me to meet them, and I thought it very grand to be strolling about the garden with the celebrated tenor Gardoni. Another guest was Manuel Garcia, the teacher of Jenny Lind, whom I first met on this occasion, and who proved, and is still, such an excellent friend to us all.

It was in this year (1849) that my brother brought to our house its brightest ornament, his charming young bride, Jeanie Hughes, the daughter of my father's old friend, John Hughes, and sister to the author of 'Tom Brown.' She is now known to fame by her devotion in the latter years of her short life to the cause of the poor and friendless, and in those early days by her beauty and accomplishments, and by the nameless charm which won all hearts. The great painter, George Frederick Watts, has preserved a record of her beauty in the fine portrait which was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1859 and frequently of late years in exhibitions of Mr. Watts' works. It represents her kneeling on a chair, watering a pot of lilies-of-the-valley, a fitting emblem of her sweetness and purity. Her wonderful pale golden hair stands out against the green background, but as the face is nearly in profile, the beautiful gray eyes are half veiled by their broad lids.*

She filled our house with music. From a child she had sung sweetly, and after her marriage she studied under Garcia as thoroughly as if she had intended to make singing her profession. He was delighted with her voice and dramatic power, and under his tuition she became a perfect drawing-room singer. Had her circumstances been different she would no doubt have obtained public success. Although most kind in responding without any affected reluctance to the entreaties of her friends, she liked nothing so well as singing for her brother Tom Hughes' concerts for the poor—'penny gaffs,' as we used to call them—and her voice was sufficiently penetrating to fill even the Albert Hall. No greater compliment could have been paid to her singing than the fact that our friends at Hyde Park Gate preferred it to the sound of their own voices. However lively the talk, perfect silence was sure to follow when she began to sing. She also read aloud and acted admirably; she was fond of painting and modelling,* and she attracted to our house some of the most distinguished artists of the day. The novelist and ex-minister, Massimo d'Azeglio, who for some time lived with Marochetti, and tried to support himself by painting, was one of her greatest friends. He was not a great painter, but he was the perfect type of a graceful preux chevalier. The sculptor Marochetti, the 'Signor,' as Watts was called by his friends, Millais (who painted her as the mother in the 'Rescue'), Phillips, Richard Doyle, Hallé, and Garcia, were frequently at our house.

* The picture is now in the possession of her son, Walter Nassau Senior.

One evening Garcia brought Gordigiani, who was delighted with my sister-in-law's rendering of his songs, in which he accompanied her himself. Nothing could surpass her singing of sacred music. Her voice was mezzo-soprano, and she sang the old Latin hymns to perfection, also Handel and Mozart, and the Irish melodies, to which her clear enunciation gave a special charm. Florid bravura was not in her line. She was anxious to sing French as perfectly as Italian, and she took lessons of Lefort, who often dined with us when we were alone, and sang to us in the evening. One of her most intimate friends was Mrs. Sartoris, who used to sing her thrilling adaptations of Tennyson's words. A frequent guest was Tom Taylor, who, with his irresistible drollery, often kept us up—even my father, who disliked late hours—half the night in fits of laughter.

* A bust that she modelled of her boy was first-rate. My father had it executed in marble.

The Wigans, who did so much for the English stage, were also friends of ours. It was at the time when Wigan was manager of the Olympic, where the inimitable genius Robson ran his short and brilliant course, and used to convulse us with laughter in 'Villekins and his Dinah,' or dissolve us into tears in 'The Porter's Knot.'

Towards the end of the fifties my sister-in-law was attacked by the malady which ultimately caused her death. Her devoted friend and physician, Dr. Gueneau de Mussy, advised her to leave the turmoil of London, and my brother took a nice roomy old-fashioned house on the top of Lavender Hill, Wandsworth. There was a large garden which, under the assiduous care of Jeanie and her mother, who was now a widow and lived with her daughter, was full of roses and other flowers. It was delightful to reach this green retreat at such a short distance, and their London friends continually found their way down to the shady lawn and pleasant company of Elm House. In 1860 my sister-in-law's brother Hastings lost his wife, and he and his four children joined the family circle. She doted on children, and was charmed to have the care of these little ones. She was the centre and sunshine of her home, and yet her heart was unsatisfied; she could not forget the sufferings of those who were less happily circumstanced.

For a time during the Crimean War she had helped Miss Stanley in sending supplies to our soldiers and their families, and when it was all over she never ceased regretting the interest which this public duty and hope of doing good on a large scale had afforded her. Some time afterwards Miss Octavia Hill associated her in some of her valuable charities, and in February, 1873, Mr. Stansfeld, President of the Local Government Board, appointed Mrs. Nassau Senior to the post of temporary, and, in the following January, permanent Inspector 'to inquire and report, especially on the female department of workhouses and workhouse schools, the care and education of pauper girls, and the nursing of infants.' She was the first woman ever employed in this capacity.

My father had always advocated the employment of women as inspectors for women, and it would have been a great pleasure to him had he known that his daughter-in-law would be the first to lead the way. Of the zeal and intelligence with which she performed her duties it is impossible to speak too highly. She travelled all over the country. When at home she would visit unexpectedly a school before daylight, to ascertain the atmosphere in which the children slept. Her tact and never-failing sweetness made suggestion and even reproof welcome from her lips. She embodied the result of her inquiries in a masterly report, which is still frequently consulted by our statesmen. She was one of the first to set on foot a Girls' Industrial School in Kensington, and the institution of the Girls' Friendly Society was mainly due to her suggestion. She warmly advocated the boarding-out system; she used to say the girls wanted 'mothering.'

With all these deep interests and multifarious occupations there was no one more easily amused and apparently light-hearted in society. She had an acute sense of fun, and although not witty herself, was, from her ready response, the cause of wit in others. Her voice in speaking, as in singing, was remarkably sweet, like a deep-toned silver bell, and her merry laugh, 'without any control but the sweet one of gracefulness,' made all around her gay. She was great in organizing balls, tableaux, theatricals, to please the children and young people. As already stated, her own acting and her reading of Shakespeare were admirable.

She was as much admired and beloved in her husband's family as in her own, and I confess it was a great blow to me when she took up the public work which she performed so well. I knew that her state of health required rest, and this was unceasing toil. For some time nothing seemed to tire her. She slept badly, yet she rose very early to fulfil her much-loved tasks. At length she broke down suddenly. 'I fell down as if shot!' she said to me; and she was condemned to absolute repose. How beautiful she used to look, lying on her couch, in her white draperies, as bright and as sympathetic as ever! Her friends flocked to see her as often as the doctors would permit them; and she continued to assist with her advice and experience those who were engaged in the work which interested her so deeply.

Mrs. Hughes took a cottage at Totland Bay, in the Isle of Wight. It stood on the green cliffs overlooking the Needles and the sea—that wonderful bay, sparkling with crystals and brilliant sands. The garden was full of flowers and perfumes: a hedge of sweet-briar and sweet peas surrounded it. My sister-in-law delighted in the air and scenery. She made several pretty oil-sketches of the views. She used to go about in the lanes and on the cliffs in a reclining chair, propelled by her husband, son, or brother. Surrounded by her family, within reach of congenial friends (both Watts and Tennyson were within a walk), her health improved greatly in the perfect peace and sunshine. Hopes were entertained of her permanent recovery, and on her return to Elm House she resumed, in the joy of her emancipation, her usual busy life. But she over-estimated her strength; she did too much; and one evening, on her return from a visit to an old and invalid uncle, to whom she had been singing, she was struck down by her old enemy. The next time I saw her she was dying, and on Saturday, March 24, 1877, at three o'clock in the morning, she passed away, to the heart-rending grief of all around her.

She herself had no fear of death. Her religious faith was strong and deep, and, at the same time, broad and liberal, for she belonged to the school of F. D. Maurice. The next world was more real to her than the present. She wrote to me some years before, when a terrible tragedy had occurred—the death by drowning of her nephew, a promising boy of ten years old, a godson of Maurice, who was on a visit to her and her mother :

‘I never regret the death of anyone, and I absolutely feel joy when a child dies. . . . I am not low-spirited, dear, so do not fidget about me. I am cheerful, for I do not think that anything in life is real, and heaven, the only reality, will be so soon present to all of us ; so it does not much matter what happens here. We shall all be joyful, and we shall all love each other perfectly, there.’

Although it was against her principles to grieve, her heart suffered, and it was long before she got over the effects of this terrible blow.

Beautiful as she had been in life, she was even more lovely in death. Mme. Lind Goldschmidt, who loved her very dearly, and to whom I at once communicated the sad tidings, wrote :

‘How good of you to write to me. Well I can understand that you do not yet feel resigned. But such an angel as she looked in her coffin we must not wish back again to life. No doubt she must have died with a vision of her Saviour. Never shall I forget the sight.’

Indeed, it was difficult to feel resigned at the early close of a life so lovely and beneficent. The following lines—I know not who wrote them—appeared in the next week's Spectator:

' True woman, gentle, and yet strong,
To strive with misery and wrong ;
Thy voice was like a rhythmic song
Mid aimless voices !

' The Poet, whose fine ear hath caught
The music with which life is fraught,
Through all discordant deed and thought,
Is loved and honoured.

' He does but listen, and translate
For us who stand behind the gate
The harmonies for which we wait,
And yet discover not.

' But thou with patient loving care
Didst add a lost note here and there
To the world's symphony, and dare
To make it sweeter.

' We, who have not learnt to play
The tune God sets us day by day,
Look up with wondering eyes, and say,
" What was thy secret ?" '

CHAPTER VI.

LONDON IN THE FIFTIES.

SANGUINE politicians hoped that the Great Exhibition of 1851 would inaugurate the reign of universal peace and goodwill. A little more than a year afterwards England lost, as we thought, the last of her military heroes in Arthur, Duke of Wellington. He was treated during his life with almost royal honours; everyone, gentle or simple, bowed to him as he passed (it always gave me a thrill to meet him), and he invariably responded by a military salute.

He lay in state like a king after he died, and his public funeral was a grand sight. Dean Milman offered me a seat in St. Paul's, but I preferred going with my father to the Athenæum to see the procession, which I afterwards regretted, for I heard that the Dean's reading of the service was most impressive. The most striking feature in the procession was the Duke's charger, led along with his master's boots reversed in the stirrups; and also I was much moved by the solemn tones of the 'Dead March,' the sound dying away as each successive regiment marched past, to be taken up by the one that followed.

Not many months elapsed ere there were rumours of disturbance, and early in 1854 the Crimean War broke out, and the reign of peace was over.

With what intense interest we at home followed the fortunes of our brave soldiers, and with what grief and indignation we heard of their sufferings, caused partly by carelessness and jobbery, will never be forgotten by those who lived at that time. The Saturday Review rose into fame by its unflinching determination to expose these abuses.

On one memorable evening in the winter of 1855, we young people (our father and mother were abroad) had the honour of receiving Sir Colin Campbell at dinner at Hyde Park Gate on his way back from Windsor. He had left the Crimea with the intention of placing his resignation in the hands of the Queen, but Her Majesty persuaded him to retract his decision. 'I told the Queen,' he said to us, 'that I would not have resumed my sword at the command of a King, but that I could refuse Her Majesty nothing.'

He had an old-fashioned fatherly courtesy, which, joined to his great reputation, made him very fascinating; and when he kissed our hands and bade us 'Good-bye,' we were deeply affected at the thoughts of the life of danger, privation and difficulty to which he was returning. Happily, he had not nearly terminated his victorious career. He was a very remarkable-looking man, lion-like in appearance. His grizzled hair stood up stiff and curly; hard work, climate, and anxiety had ploughed deep furrows in his face, and in every line one read power and determination. Although their callings were so different, both he and his A.D.C., Sir Anthony Stirling, were great friends of my father's, and many of Lord Clyde's conversations in Paris are recorded in his journals.

In Sir Anthony Stirling's latter days he built for himself the White House in the Knightsbridge Road, and in it he used to receive a very amusing circle of statesmen, philosophers, artists, men of distinction and of promise of all kinds. Smoking was the rule, and as women were not so 'advanced' in those days, they were invited only occasionally. These parties were the origin of the Cosmopolitan Club.

We spent many delightful evenings at Stratheden House, then the abode of Lord-Chancellor Campbell, and at Kent House, close by. That Kent House has now disappeared, together with all the interesting people who at that time occupied it, with the exception of Mr. Charles Villiers, the Father of the House of Commons. His sister, Lady Theresa, the wife of Sir George Cornwall Lewis, possessed every charm. Beautiful, clever, full of grace and kindness, Richard Ford used to say that she was 'one of those beings now and then sent from heaven to show us what the angels are like.' Her mother, Mrs. Villiers, a most agreeable lady, the Dowager Lady Morley, than whom no one was ever more witty and amusing, the reigning Lord and Lady Morley, Mr. Charles Villiers, and the children of the two families, completed the circle—an honourable exception to the rule that in England two families cannot live under the same roof. Lady Theresa was the principal hostess; her cordial welcome put everyone in good humour. There is a disposition among those who pride themselves on sincerity to carp at this delightful social adaptability, but it is seldom possessed by any but really kind-hearted people, and if they forget us when we are absent, it is not that they cease to care for us, only there is no room in their memory for so many at once, any more than there is for all their friends together in an ordinary London drawing-room; we must be content to take our turn.

Kent House, however, could hold as many people as the hospitable hostess could desire. It was a large Georgian house, standing alone, and looking on the Park—the same aspect as our own more humble abode; a balcony ran round it, on which one of the members of the family was accused of taking an air bath every morning. There was a spacious drawing-room devoted to conversation, and smaller rooms on the first floor, and in the large dining-room they had music and dancing and acting, besides the most amusing dinner-parties.

On one evening three or four friends, of whom Kinglake was one, were sitting together in the drawing-room, when Thackeray, then in the zenith of his fame, strode through the room, and I said idly, 'I should like to know that man,' on which 'Eothen' started up and brought the great novelist into our circle.

It stamps one as a fossil to remember the coming out of 'Vanity Fair,' and yet it was not my first acquaintance with Thackeray's writings. My father took in no periodicals except the time-honoured Quarterly and Edinburgh, believing that we young people would read nothing else; and great was our joy when on a short visit to Margate in the early forties we found on the table of the reading-room several enticing magazines. Of their contents I remember only 'The Great Hoggarty Diamond.'

A few years later, when 'Vanity Fair' came out, we let several numbers go by, from the dislike my father had of reading novels in numbers, and, besides, we had a sort of idea that it was an imitation of Dickens. When at length we relaxed from our rule, we were as much electrified as our neighbours, and looked forward as eagerly to each successive number. Thackeray was the first novelist to make London society amusing; in general nothing can be duller than imaginary parties, however entertaining real ones may be to the actors therein.

After the first introduction, Thackeray frequently came to our house, and we met him, of course, everywhere; but I never thoroughly appreciated him until I knew his daughters and saw him in his own house. I first saw Miss Thackeray at an amateur pantomime founded on Guy Fawkes, which amused all London in the early fifties. The leaps of Harlequin, Mr. Bidwell of the Foreign Office, were astounding; but I think the heartiest laugh was excited when Guy Fawkes asked the man in the cellar, 'What is your name?' and he replied: 'Lord Monteagle, formerly Spring Rice.' We all turned round to look at the Lord Monteagle of our day (no relation to the detector of Guy Fawkes), the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was in the audience, and who joined in the merriment. Just before us sat Thackeray, and his daughter, then a very young lady, in a white bernous. I looked at her with great interest, and was delighted when her father introduced her, and asked us to call on his girls. We soon became great friends.

One day he gave a grand dinner at Greenwich, and I called for the Thackerays in Onslow Square. He put his head out of his study window and cried: 'Wait till I have killed her!' I think the victim was Helen Pendennis.

Once when we were taking him home from a party, as we were passing through Curzon Street, he looked up at a small house squeezed in by the side of a public-house, and said: 'Look there! that is where Becky lived, and I lost hundreds of pounds.'

My father delighted in Thackeray's novels, and wrote a review of them, now included in his 'Essays on Fiction.'* Not long ago Mrs. Ritchie wrote to me: 'I am trying to write a preface to "Vanity Fair," and I found myself describing your father coming up on his horse, with a very loose rein, carrying the review in his hand. My daddy always said that it gave him a start.' I replied: 'As if one could give a start to a rider who has already won the race.' It was a rare instance of an author being satisfied with a criticism of his works.

Our intimacy became still closer when the Thackerays occupied the charming house he built in Palace Green. It was inaugurated by a play founded on 'Lovel the Widower.' The younger Miss Thackeray, afterwards Mrs. Leslie Stephen, was a first-rate actress. She and Miss Bayne and Miss Cameron performed the parts of the three old ladies, and were admirably droll. Thackeray resisted all attempts to make him act, unless he might have nothing to say. So he came on at the end as Mr. Bottomley, and the applause was deafening.

* Published by Longmans, 1864.

Like everyone else, he was very fond of my sister-in-law, and a frequent visitor at Elm House. On one occasion he took my nephew to a circus, and a charming account of it appeared in the 'Roundabout Papers,' in which my nephew figured as 'Walter Junior.'

We used to have all sorts of fun with the Thackerays—once a cooking party in the kitchen, when we felt very picturesque in caps and aprons; I was not up to more than peeling potatoes, but some of the young ladies—notably the Miss Coles—manifested great skill. Another time Miss Thackeray took us to the manager's box at the play, and between the acts we went behind the scenes and talked to the actors. When the curtain was down we went on the stage, and how cold and draughty it felt, and how dull and squalid! It was enough to cure one of being stage-struck.

Thackeray's chivalrous devotion to his mother, a beautiful, dignified old lady, and the pains he took to make himself agreeable to his womankind, made it delightful to see him in the midst of his family. He was extremely sociable, and one was sure of a warm welcome from old and young whenever one crossed the threshold.

We used to meet frequently and take long walks in Kensington Gardens. In the summer of the year 1863 I met him alone, and he walked with me, and in the course of conversation said that his physician, Dr. Ferguson, had told him that unless he took the greatest care he could not live many months, and he added that he was resigned to the idea, as his daughters were now able to take care of themselves. He looked so strong and full of life that I could not believe him, and it was a great shock when on Christmas Day, 1863, we heard of his sudden death.

No two people could be much more unlike in many respects than Thackeray and my father, yet they got on capitally. There was one strong link between them in my father's great liking for his daughters, and Thackeray was drawn to all who were fond of them. They would come in very kindly in the evening when we were alone, for my father's health generally shut him up in the winter, and after they were gone he would say, 'Those are two very agreeable girls,' or some other expression of approbation, which for him, who never gushed, was high praise.

No one who knew intimately Thackeray's younger daughter—the first Mrs. Leslie Stephen—could ever forget her. The heroine in her sister's novel, 'Old Kensington,' must have been drawn from her. Her beautiful bronze hair, brilliantly white teeth, and delicate complexion, one minute with the soft tint of the China rose, and then again white as a lily, together with the crisp daintiness of her dress, gave one the impression of the most exquisite freshness. One day she would look like the young girl she really was, and on the next twenty years older, so varying were her moods and expression. To those with whom she felt no sympathy she appeared cold and reserved, for she was sincere almost to bluntness ; but beneath this exterior was a most tender and loving heart. She was one of those people who do not like ; they love, and are beloved in return. She probably possessed the literary talent of the family, for her letters were most entertaining, and her conversation full of fun. She and I became much attached to each other. We did all sorts of things together ; we got up a Latin class, and shared a district, besides the frivolous amusements that I have already described.

To own that one knew personally the poet Rogers stamps one as a septuagenarian as much as recollecting the first appearance of 'Vanity Fair.' He was very kind to young ladies, and I frequently drove with him and breakfasted with him. Lord Glenelg, who was a great friend of mine, albeit forty years older, was often present at these breakfasts, and a great support to me, for if I happened to be alone with the poet my enjoyment was tempered with awe. Once I remember I was so rash as to observe idly that the hands of the Magdalene in the splendid Titian which he bequeathed to the nation seemed to me unfinished. He would not let this foolish remark pass for what it was worth—nothing—but ordered his servant Edmund to take down the picture, and bring it in from the adjoining room. To my shame, it was set on the breakfast-table, and my host proceeded to prove to me how thoughtless my remark had been. He had also a habit in society of talking of those who were present in a loud voice, for he was very deaf ; sometimes his remarks were anything but complimentary, and it was very confusing to pass, as a listener, for an accomplice. But, in spite of my fear, I enjoyed his society, his excellent stories, and his recollections of other days exceedingly. He was beginning (quite wrongly) to fancy himself superannuated when I knew him. I remember sitting next to him at dinner one day, and being intensely amused by his stories of Mrs. Jordan and her contemporaries, when he suddenly broke off, saying, 'But people now do not care for these old-world stories.' I saw him in his latter days at Brighton. He softened much as time went on, and my last impression of him is sitting in the bow window of his house, in his wheeled chair, thoroughly enjoying the sunset, which was flooding the sky and sea with waves of crimson and gold. His sister, Miss Rogers, was as sociable as her brother, and received much the same agreeable people in her house in the Regent's Park. I once met the poet Wordsworth there; but all I remember of him is that he wore green spectacles. I do not think he spoke a word.

Many other remarkable people besides Rogers were celebrated for their breakfast-parties. In short, these were the palmy days of breakfasts. When two or three politicians wished to lay their heads together, or two friends wanted an intimate chat without interruption, they asked each other to breakfast. My father used to breakfast in this way two or three times a week with Lord Lansdowne, and constantly a friend or two dropped in at our table. Lord Dalmeny (father of the late Premier), Mr. Tufnell, Mr. Charles Villiers, were among our most frequent impromptu guests. Besides these intimate little gatherings, breakfast parties were all the fashion. Lord Lansdowne, Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton), Bunsen, 'Bear' Ellice, Van de Weyer, Sir Henry Holland, Rogers, Sydney Smith, and many other distinguished people, constantly gave them. So did my father, and the most interesting and nourishing conversations I ever heard took place on these occasions. No one could say that such parties were a waste of time, for it was more improving to listen to Whately, Hallam, Macaulay, Guizot, or Tocqueville, than to read a chapter of their works. It is not a form of society which would suit the present day, when everything is so large and crowded; these parties were too small to be of any use in paying off social debts, and gave no opportunity for display of wealth. The same people were invited over and over again if they were good talkers or good listeners, or people that others wished to meet. There was usually some leading talker, such as Macaulay, or the other luminaries I have mentioned. My father was a capital host, and knew how to induce the guests to play their appropriate parts.

Women were seldom invited, unless by special request, or if they were known to be good listeners, or not too shy to join in general conversation, for a separate tête-à-tête in such a party was fatal. 'Women are non-conductors,' Mrs. Grote used to say; but there were brilliant exceptions, such as Mme. Mohl, Mme. de Peyronnet, Mrs. Grote, Mrs. Marcet, and one or two more who knew when to talk and when to listen.

One of my great treats, after I was about twelve years old, was to be called down occasionally to fill a gap in the dinner-table when a guest failed, or a fourteenth was wanted. I have never forgotten the kindness which many of our guests showed to me—for instance, Mr. Edward Villiers, who had all the charm of his family, Mr. Van de Weyer, Mr. Edward Romilly, Sir Edmund Head, Mr. Babbage, and others, too many to enumerate, who were kind enough to treat me as if I had been grown-up. Most especially I remember Sir Charles Eastlake. His gentle manners set me completely at ease; he seemed as willing to talk to a little girl as he would have been to a great politician or philosopher. He had a high appreciation and great liking for my father, as one reads in Lady Eastlake's biography of her husband. She herself was hardly less distinguished. It was only the other day that she was still amongst us, and to the last there was no conversation more interesting and instructive. As years went on we became more and more intimate; but I never saw so much of her as in the year 1886, when we both had houses on the, to me, most delightful spot in the world, Albury Heath, and we met at least once a day.

A very prominent character in our circle was Charles Babbage, the celebrated calculator. His Saturday-evening parties were thronged with the élite of cultivated society. One saw there all the lions of the day. I remember well the tall, powerful form of George Borrow, in whose books I revelled; and on another occasion Dickens, the Grand Duchess Stéphanie of Baden, and once Mme. Hahn-Hahn, whose novels were much relished at that time, when they were thought a little risky: in the present day they would be considered rather tame.

Mr. Babbage lived in a small house in Dorset Square, with a very commonplace drawing-room, a contrast to the company. In the middle was the celebrated calculating machine, and in a corner the 'silver lady,' a figure about two feet high, which moved her head and arms most gracefully, and even moved her eyes.

The origin of these parties was on this wise. When he first came to London, Mr. Babbage's mother lived with him. She was anxious to see some of the remarkable people he talked about, but she was too old and infirm to mix in society, so he contrived to place her in a corner of his drawing-room, whence she could see all the guests as they came in without the fatigue of being introduced to them. I have heard that he also had a room for the servants, with tea and coffee, papers and books, to prevent their waiting outside in the cold.

A most inveterate diner-out for a period of, I should think, half a century, was the late Abraham Hayward. He was not a great favourite with young women, for he was in the habit of telling questionable stories. But he was undoubtedly clever and amusing, and very accurate. I have heard him say, 'My dear fellow, I am always right,' and he was right. It has been said that he never repeated himself; but all his acquaintances were not of this opinion, for a witty lady, the daughter of a well-known novelist (not Miss Thackeray), said of him, 'Mr. Hayward ought really to get a new barrel for his organ.' He once remarked impertinently to the same lady :

'Of course, you do not know what a faux pas means.'

‘Is it a pas de deux?’ she retorted.

There was another well-known diner-out, Mr. Fleming. He was very small and lively, and Mrs. Grote called him the Flea. He was introduced to society by Charles Buller, whose great friend he was, and made his way by his pleasant manners and amusing gossip. It was said that when Lady Palmerston wanted to know which way the political wind blew, she sent him out on a horse in the Park. He was very good-looking, and we were all much exercised to guess his age. He wore an undeniable brown wig, and had a lovely complexion and brilliant teeth, how much due to art no one could tell.

There was a story current that his rooms in St. James’s Street were once entered by a burglar. Mr. Fleming was in bed, and saw the tablecloth move, so he jumped out, locked the door, and screamed ‘Police!’ from a window. The man was caught, and next day Mr. Fleming appeared against him at the police office; but the policeman would not take his deposition, for he said it was a little old gentleman with a bald head who summoned him in the night, not the smart young man who stood before him.

Lady Chantrey, the widow of the sculptor, used to give very pleasant and frequent dinners. I remember one party at her house at which Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, Lockhart, the Miss Nightingales (then not so well known to fame), and Sir Edwin Landseer were present. Landseer looked round the table, and remarked that in future years no one would believe that it was once the fashion for ladies never to show their ears. This was true, for the ears were always con-sealed by the hair. 'Tire-bouchons à l'Anglaise' were then the mode. Happily it passed away very soon after I came out, for the ringlets increased the size of the head and threw the figure out of proportion.

Another, still uglier, fashion was the wearing of 'fronts' by elderly ladies. Women were ashamed of white hair, which is now justly considered an ornament. My mother wore a black front or wig, which was bound on the forehead with black velvet (it was thought beautiful to have as high a forehead as possible: some people shaved theirs), until she was seventy, on which day she went to the hairdresser and came back with her own lovely silver curls, to our great astonishment and satisfaction.

Besides those whom I have already mentioned, there were several very clever ladies with whom we were intimate, and whom in my young days I assiduously cultivated, for I always preferred the society of those who were older than myself.

I remember going when quite a child to help Mrs. Austin correct her proofs. I cannot imagine what use I could possibly have been to her, but it was very kind of her to allow me to suppose that I helped her. She long survived my father, and to the last I had great pleasure in visiting her and Mr. Austin at their little cottage at Weybridge. It was astonishing and delightful to hear him talk: every sentence that dropped from his lips was as definite and bright as a newly-coined sovereign, and every opinion clear and decided. His delicate health, which prevented his taking the position he ought to have held or earning a regular income, had made their early life a hard struggle : Mrs. Austin did her best by her admirable translations to supply deficiencies, but it was hard work, and very inadequately remunerated. They travelled all over the Continent, chiefly in Germany, and knew everyone worth knowing, especially all the crowned heads, for whom Mrs. Austin seemed to have a special attraction.

The Revolution of 1848 drove them from Paris, where they had a most agreeable salon ; but I am sure that the happiest period in their lives was the time—twelve years—they spent together at Weybridge. It was a deferred and long honeymoon.

Mrs. Austin was very handsome. Her face resembled her daughter's and grand-daughter's, but her manner was totally different, and her conversation slow, but very interesting.

She took rather sad and solemn views of life. I remember how gloomy were her prognostications on the famous 10th April, 1848. It was doubtless my ignorance which made me take the whole thing as a joke. Every man I knew was a special constable ; no vehicle was allowed to pass, so the ladies walked to visit each other and heighten each other's terrors. A chain was put on our front-door, and the footman spent the day looking through the chink, ready to bang it together on the approach of the rioters, and two of our neighbours—one very tall and the other very short—marched up and down before our house with clubs to protect us from their fury. Every half hour a messenger rode down to the lodge opposite to our house to say that nothing had happened. Mrs. Austin came to us : 'There will be bloodshed,' she said, in a sepulchral voice. Another lady, whose son was a special constable, exclaimed, 'If only I had another son I should not mind.' Next day I rode down to meet my father at the Duke of York's steps, and the little boys groaned at me. And that was all I knew of the Chartist demonstration.

Mrs. Austin found her master at Weybridge in her pony Jemmy, who had a stronger will than any animal I ever came across, and who refused to move unless Mr. Austin would pull him uphill. It was to Mrs. Austin that I heard Sir George Lewis one day in our house make his celebrated speech that 'Life would be very tolerable if it were not for its amusements.'

We used frequently to meet Lady Charlotte Lindsay, whose reputation for wit and humour has survived to this day; she was kind enough to talk to me very often. Lady Duff Gordon (née Cornwall), whose son married Lucy Austin, was another charming old lady. She was a contemporary of Lord Lansdowne, and had the manners and racy expressions of that period.

There was no one equal to Lady William Russell, the mother of three distinguished sons—Hastings, Duke of Bedford, Lord Arthur Russell, and Lord Ampthill. We made her acquaintance at Carlsbad in the year 1840. Soon afterwards she took the Stephens' house next door to us in Hyde Park Gate, and we became very intimate. Her sons never forgot the interest my father took in their studies and opinions, and were always grateful for the assistance he gave them. Lady William was a very cultivated as well as charming woman. She read a great deal, and was a classical scholar. She told me that the Princess Lieven once said to her, 'You are very agreeable, but you would be much more so if you did not read so much,' the Princess being in the habit of taking in all her information orally.

Lady William had a severe accident in 1861, and never walked again or went to parties, but all the cream of society collected round her every afternoon and evening. Her salon was more agreeable than any French salon, for there was less formality. Its youth was kept up by her three devoted sons, Lord and Lady Palmerston, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Lady Westmoreland—in short, all the most remarkable political and literary people constantly went there, and the foreign element was not wanting. One of the wittiest, cleverest, and most interesting habitués was Mme. de Peyronnet, one of whose charming daughters married Lord Arthur Russell. Mme. de Peyronnet was English by birth, and her handsome, stately person was thoroughly English, while she had the brilliancy and sociability of her adopted country. She wrote almost as well as she talked, and I hope that some of her writings may be collected and given to the world. I say almost, for nothing in writing comes up to the spontaneous flow, the varied tones and gestures, which accompany good conversation.

Not one of Lady William's distinguished sons reached the age allotted to man. The last survivor was Lord Arthur. To great modesty he joined the most varied information and interests, he was an ardent politician, he delighted in books and conversation, but he was equally happy and at home in country life, and knew the history of every beast and bird and flower. He was the most sympathetic and helpful of friends, and his loss is an abiding grief to all who had the happiness of knowing him.

Another Englishwoman (married abroad), my dear old friend Mme. Mohl, was a constant visitor at Lady William's whenever she was within reach, as well as her husband, the celebrated Orientalist, Julius Mohl. I have spoken of her at so much length elsewhere,* and, what is far better, allowed her and M. Mohl to speak for themselves in their amusing and interesting letters, that I feel there is nothing more to say, and, indeed, she was such an original person that a few sentences would give no idea of her striking personality.

We knew Mrs. Gaskell only a few years before she left the world which she enriched by her genius. She was most womanly and attractive; the expression of her countenance was lovely, and her manner very prepossessing. I had a charming letter from her on my marriage, and was looking forward to seeing more of her when we were startled by her sudden death, in the full plenitude of her powers, in the new home which she had so lovingly prepared for her family. It is distressing to think how many delightful tales would have issued from her pen. She did not think it necessary to be either immoral, irreligious, or improper to gain the ear of the public, and she never wrote anything better than her last unfinished work, 'Wives and Daughters.'

* 'Letters and Recollections of Julius and Mary Mohl,' by M. C. M. Simpson. Kegan Paul and Co., 1888. Their letters to Lady William are published in this book.

A very different lady, whom I knew long and well, and liked extremely, was Mrs. Procter, 'Our Lady of Bitterness,' as 'Eothen' calls her; but I cannot say that I ever found much bitterness in her, except to those (such as Carlyle) who spoke evil of the people she loved. She wrote scarcely anything for the press, and her papers were burnt after her death, which was a great pity, as she kept up long correspondences with interesting people and wrote admirable letters herself. But her forte was talking, and no one was more agreeable and piquant. All the literary world flocked to her rooms in the Queen Anne's, and afterwards in the Albert Hall, Mansions, but I think I enjoyed her society even more in the older days, when the health of her distinguished husband kept the crowd away from the house in Weymouth Street, where I often found her alone and enjoyed a thorough good chat. It was something to know a lady who had been a friend of Charles Lamb, and whose beauty was much admired by him. Indeed, she retained great traces of it to the last in her delicate features and clear eyes and complexion.

Lady Bell, the widow of the eminent anatomist, was in her latter years a great friend of mine. She lived to a great age, and was still beautiful. It was most interesting to hear her talk of old times, and among other events describe the Eglinton Tournament, at which she was present in the pouring rain under an umbrella—a decided anachronism.

CHAPTER VII.

COUNTRY HOUSES.

My father was extremely fond of country-house visiting, both in England and abroad, on account of the much greater opportunity it gives for intimacy than town-life affords, and also he used to say that living in other people's houses 'got one out of one's ways.' I remember one year when we paid eleven visits running, at the end of which I felt, as Sir Walter Scott says, like a poodle which has been standing too long on its hindlegs ; but he was quite ready to begin again in a week or two.

We frequently went to Ireland, where, besides his great friends Archbishop Whately and Lord Rosse, my father had two brothers married and settled. The elder, Henry, was a retired colonel in the army, married to an Irish lady (Miss Fitzhenry), who bought a charming little place — Glassdrummond, in County Down—close to the sea and the Mourne Mountains. The other, Edward, who was twenty years younger, began life as a soldier, got very tired of peace duties, left the army at twenty-five, when he became a captain, and was appointed one of the assistant-commissioners in the north of Ireland, under the new Poor Law, and afterwards Poor Law Commissioner at Dublin.*

In 1844 my father and Uncle Edward took for the summer Buncrana Castle, a tumbledown, picturesque old place, overlooking Loch Swilly. It was, as we irreverent cockneys said, like a scene in a ballet: the house was perched upon a cliff, the loch in front, and the mountains behind, surrounded by wooded walks, and, of course, a glen. No Irish place is without a glen.

There were some interesting people in the neighbourhood. In a letter to Lord Lansdowne my father wrote: 'Among the natives the most interesting that I have seen is Mr. Hastings, the Rector of Kilmacrenan, a man of high birth, for he is next in remainder to Lord Huntingdon and married to a daughter of Lord Granard's, and in manner and appearance the most perfect specimen of the best class of old Irish clergy. Forty-four years ago, having served and still serving in one of the Irish militia regiments, he took orders and became curate of Selbridge in the County Wicklow. But the state of the country was not such as to enable any good officer to be spared. So he kept his military rank and drew his pay, and on Sundays used to put on a gown over his military trousers and boots, and directly he left the pulpit put on his red coat and parade his men. He was rewarded with the rectory of Kilmacrenan, in the centre of the remotest part of Donegal, containing 10,000 people and about 140 square miles. Ribbandism, Orangeism, Catholicism, and Protestantism had been so fierce that his predecessor was actually worried out.

* He was killed by a railway accident in 1865.

The political differences he could not appease, but he thought he could the religious ones. So he begged the Catholic priest and the Presbyterian minister to meet him at Letterkenny, then as now the nearest town, on a market or fair day, gave them as good a dinner as the place could afford, and as much whisky punch as he could induce them to take (not a little), and then walked with them in high glee round the fair. Much astonishment was excited by this strange conjunction, and to strengthen its effect he engaged them to meet him at the borders of his own parish. The meeting took place, they rode together over the whole parish, and concluded the evening in the whisky-cabin by potations which would have disturbed lay heads. Since that time he has had no religious differences. His church now wants repair, and the Catholic priest (who, by-the-by, is a Repeal warden) has sent him £2 for his own subscription, and recommended it from the altar.'

Another neighbour was the agent, Mr. Bateson—Tom Bateson, as he was called—also a man of good birth and connections, to whose stories we listened with avidity. He told us that some years earlier he was agent to Mr. Harvey, who owned a large estate on Lough Swilly. In the middle of this property a green promontory ran out into the loch, which Bateson thought would be a good site for a marine villa. It was occupied by five fishing families. He gave them five years' rent to induce them to go, levelled their cabins, turned their potato-grounds into a garden, and began to build the house. A conspiracy was formed to shoot him; 200 persons engaged in it, and £20 was subscribed. The place was fixed on; it was a solitary strand, about ten minutes' walk from Buncrana Castle (on it we erected in 1844 our private bathing-house). Five persons had engaged to do the job, and there can be little doubt that it would have been effected if one of them had not been arrested for some other offence and betrayed his companions to save himself. The conspirators were indicted and tried, but the jury did not venture to convict them.

Mr. Bateson did not ultimately escape. He was beaten to death in Monaghan, in the summer of 1851, for having turned into a model farm two or three farms whose tenants he had ejected.

We also saw a good deal of the Macnaghtens and Macauslands, whose places, then called Bushmills and Fruit Hill (the fine old Irish names, Dunderave and Drenagh, have been restored), were within a long drive. One of the Miss Macauslands soon afterwards became my aunt.

The Dean, then Canon, and Mrs. Milman and their sons were travelling over Ireland this summer in a huge barouche, and spent a few days with us. They were kind enough not to mind roughing it, for our splendour did not go very deep, and the rats and mice were very intrusive. The survivors of the party even now frequently allude to that amusing time.

The Milmans were among our oldest friends. The Dean and my father were at Eton together, and afterwards lived in the same circle in London. I have in the Dean's handwriting a memorandum of my father's election in 1835 to 'The Club,'* as its members proudly called it, instituted by Dr. Johnson. They met at dinner every other Tuesday. They were not required to notify their attendance beforehand, consequently there was sometimes a very small, and at others a large, but always a pleasant party. Almost all the most agreeable men in London belonged to it. These were the only men's dinners my father liked, or would ever go to, except now and then to the Political Economy Club.

* It still flourishes.

My first remembrance of the Milman family dates from the summer of 1837, when we both had houses at Ilfracombe, and we young ones had great fun together, riding donkeys, drinking tea at each other's houses, scrambling over the rocks, etc. At that time there were two dear little girls, who both died early, the elder of whom was about my age. The great beauty and sweetness of Mrs. Milman won my childish heart. She was the very ideal of a poet's wife, and the Dean dedicated one of his books 'to her who had made the poetry of life reality.' The small evening parties at their house when he was Canon of Westminster were most agreeable. He was an admirable converser, full of good stories, and very imposing to look at, handsome, stately, and dignified. At that time he was considered a scarcely orthodox theologian, but he has long been left behind in that respect. His books are too well known and appreciated to need mentioning, but I do not know if justice has ever been done to his splendid translations of Greek dramatists. His 'Bacchanals' especially is a masterpiece. When Mme. Ristori was in England she revived his tragedy of 'Fazio,' taking the part of Bianca herself. The Dean could not resist going to see it, although at that time dignitaries of the Church seldom appeared at the theatre. We also went, and were delighted, both with the piece and its interpreter. It met with complete success.

Almost as long ago as I can remember we used to pay long and frequent visits to the Hampdens, first at Oxford, where Dr. Hampden was Regius Professor, and Ewelme, the living appended to the Professorship, and afterwards at Hereford. He was my father's cousin, and his daughter was from early years my greatest friend. I was present at the curious scene in Bow Church when Dr. Hampden's election to the bishopric was opposed. He was then considered as a dangerous and aggressive theologian by the Tractarian party, who highly disapproved of his Bampton Lectures. In reality he was a very sincere and orthodox Christian, opposed to all innovations, perhaps somewhat illiberal both as regards the High and Broad Church extremes. He was a shy, silent, unassuming man, devoted to his family and a few friends, of whom my father was one.

Oxford society at that time was torn by controversy, but it did not matter to us young people, and it would be difficult to say whether I most enjoyed our visits to Oxford, where my brother and the Hughes', John Blackett, and Congreve, and various other old friends, then very young, were undergraduates and graduates; to Ewelme, where we scampered over the downs; or afterwards to the stately palace at Hereford, with its terraces bordered by roses sloping down to the Wye. The palace was almost part of the Cathedral, and it was delightful to sit in the cloisters and listen to the chanting and the organ.

We always went on from Hereford to Whitfield, the beautiful place of Mr. and Mrs. Archer Clive. Mrs. Clive was the author of the very powerful novel 'Paul Ferroll,' which made a great sensation. An accident in infancy had deprived her of the power of walking, but she determined not to let her infirmities incapacitate her for an active and useful life, nor did they in any way sour her kind and generous disposition. She was an heiress, and lived alone on her property, cut off from society, for which she had a keen relish, and in which she indulged freely after her very happy marriage. Mr. Clive inherited a fine fortune and estate. He was a singularly handsome and agreeable man, and their house in town and country was always full of the pleasantest people. She went to the play and to parties, saw everything worth seeing, read everything worth reading, travelled all over Italy and France; rode and drove, and was the friend of gentle and simple in her country-home. She had not a scrap of vanity or self-consciousness. Her poetry, although less known, is more remarkable to my mind than her novels. The 'Nine Poems by V.' are full of imagination and poetic feeling. In one of them she contrasts the happiness of her married life with the circumstances of her earlier years :

'Again I would not bear the longing heart
Which by thy devious bank, O Rea ! I bore.
Another home, another scene, have sent Life's heaven upon my scarce-believing view.
Beyond all hope, high e'en as wishes went,
The blessed now oft seems more good than true.'

The poem on the Queen's Fancy Ball was the one which attracted most attention.

The water-cure, under the skilful treatment of Dr. Gully, several times cured my father's throat when other systems failed, and Malvern was a convenient base of operations for our visits in the West. In 1851 a brilliant circle collected there, and every evening assembled at the house (Trafalgar House) which we took for the summer. Macaulay and his friend Ellis, Lord Lansdowne, Mr. and Mrs. Ford, Mr. and Mrs. Twisleton, Mr. Jellinger Symons, and last, but not least, Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle, were staying in the town.

We used to take long rides together, as Carlyle said, 'Gallop, gallop, as if you were galloping out of the world.' On one of these rides Lord Lansdowne told us the well-known story of 'Pigeon Paley,' which he had heard from Pitt himself. Pitt said that 'he once suggested to George III. that a bishopric should be offered to Paley, on which the King with his own hands took down from a bookcase a copy of Paley's "Moral Philosophy," and, having turned to the chapter on property, handed the volume to Pitt, saying that the man who had written that chapter should never be made a bishop.*' The story, therefore, is perfectly true.

* The chapter is in the following terms (it is introductory):

'If you should see a flock of pigeons in a field of corn: and if (instead of picking where and what it liked, taking first as much as it wanted, and no more) you should see ninety-nine of them gathering all they got into a heap: reserving nothing for themselves but the chaff and the refuse: keeping this heap for one, and that the weakest, perhaps worst pigeon of the flock: sitting round, and looking on, all

We had known the Carlyles in London, but these weeks made us much more intimate, and henceforth they were frequent guests at Hyde Park Gate, and Carlyle often joined us in Rotten Row. I am afraid I did not quite appreciate his extravagant theories and destructive philosophy, but I delighted in the wit and humour and originality of Mrs. Carlyle. My husband and I spent an evening in Cheyne Row just before her death, and I have one of the last letters she ever wrote telling me of the horror with which Carlyle was looking forward to delivering his address at Edinburgh. 'Mr. Carlyle,' she wrote, 'is starting for Frystone on his way to Edinburgh, in no humour, already, for doing anything but committing suicide. I am sure many a man with a good thick skin has gone to be hanged more comfortable in his mind than Mr. C. goes to make that tiresome address.'

The Fords and Seniors have been friends ever since the beginning of the century, and perhaps earlier ; for the winter, whilst this one was devouring, throwing about, and wasting it ; and if a pigeon more hardy or hungry than the rest, touched a grain of the hoard, all the others instantly flying upon it and tearing it to pieces ; if you should see this you would see nothing more than what is every day practised or established among men. Among men you see the ninety-and-nine toiling and scraping together a heap of superfluities for one ; and this one, too, oftentimes the feeblest and worst of the whole set (a child, a woman, a madman or a fool) ; getting nothing for themselves all the while but a little of the coarsest of the provision which their own industry produces ; looking quietly on while they see the fruits of all their labour spent or spoiled ; and if one of the number take or touch a particle of the hoard, the others joining against him, and hanging him for the theft.' (Book III., Part I., Chap. i., p. 119.)

in the year 1800 Sir Richard and Lady Ford and my grandfather and grandmother had adjacent houses in Sloane Street, with parallel gardens, in which the children used to meet. Sir Richard had long been dead when I first remember his widow, a very clever old lady of the 'Ancien Régime,' very aristocratic in her notions, abominating railroads, and never choosing to enter a train. She was my brother's godmother, and used to bring him most beautiful presents. She lived in the house (17, Park Street) now inhabited by her daughter-in-law, and filled then, as now, with fine old pictures. Her sons, Richard (the father of Sir Clare, our Ambassador in Rome), author of the 'Handbook in Spain,' and his brother James, a Prebendary of Exeter, were both distinguished men; the latter wrote some very pretty poetry and an excellent translation of the 'Divina Commedia.' Some people were so wicked as to call them 'Sacred and Profane Ford.' Richard, the elder, albeit somewhat cynical, was a most agreeable companion. He was slight, dark, Spanish-looking, with delicate, aquiline features; he was full of wit and fun, and very sociable. There were no dinner-parties more agreeable than his. He was cultivated, as the French say, down to the end of his finger-nails, an accomplished draughtsman, and connoisseur.

There was artistic talent in the family, for his aunt, Miss Booth, a pupil of Sir Joshua Reynolds, painted a likeness of my father as a boy of twelve which is quite worthy of her master. It is now in the possession of my nephew Walter, and I have a beautiful pencil copy of it by Morelli. The friendship between our families was drawn yet closer by the marriage of James Ford's daughter to Tom Hughes, my sister-in-law's brother.

A few miles' drive over the Malvern Hills on the top of a coach, and latterly a few minutes through the tunnel (an even more striking change of decoration), brought us into the totally different county of Herefordshire, where the ground is tossed about in hill and dale, unlike the fertile plain of Worcestershire. After Hereford and Whitfield we went on to Harpton in Radnorshire, first in the time of Sir Frankland Lewis, and afterwards in that of his more distinguished son and his charming wife, Lady Theresa. George Cornwall Lewis was one of my father's most valued friends. He had a singularly cold manner, but no man was more beloved in his own family, and appreciated by his few intimate friends. He was an amusing contrast to his wife, Lady Theresa. I remember her complaining at Harpton of a tree which overshadowed the drawing-room and interfered with the view.

'Why cannot you,' said Sir George, 'when you come into the country, sit with your back to the window and read your book?'

When we met him on an electioneering tour in Herefordshire he was unbending his mind over Whewell's 'Inductive Philosophy' and Mill's 'Political Economy' in the carriage as they drove from place to place. His first question on entering the house of an elector was not to ask for his vote, but to inquire if any people in the parish had attained one hundred years.

Lewis's writings on the 'Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion' and the 'Government of Dependencies' are too profound to be generally popular. A very clever lady, Miss Ellen Smith, of Oxford, complained to Sir James Stephen of my father, who had induced her to buy these books by writing such an interesting article upon them. He had pulled out all the plums.

Lewis's calm judgment, great knowledge and conscientiousness, made his early loss a great misfortune to the Liberal party. In 1863, at the time of his death, he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the politicians of that day agreed with my father that, without doubt, he would have become Prime Minister.

I have known only three English Prime Ministers. I have seen Lord Melbourne, who sometimes came to dine at Hyde Park Gate in early days, but all I remember of him is his very hearty laugh. We used frequently to meet Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, and we went to their parties in Carlton Gardens. Lord Russell we often met, especially at Bowood, and Lord Palmerston. We used to go constantly to Lady Palmerston's parties, and we paid a very pleasant visit to Broadlands in January, 1853. It was a curious household. No one ever cared to know what o'clock it was: the dinner-hour depended on Lord Palmerston's letters. Sometimes it was nine o'clock, an astonishing hour in those days, and he and Lady Palmerston used to sit up for hours after their guests had gone to bed. Lady Shaftesbury was staying in the house, and she told us that her mother sometimes came into her room at three in the morning in her evening dress.

Lady Palmerston had the remains of great beauty. Her deep-blue eyes never lost their charm, and she was sweetness and kindness itself. In the afternoon she took me out driving in her yellow chariot, hung upon high C-springs, which swayed to and fro like a hammock. We did not start till dusk, so not much of the country was visible; however, the society of my kind hostess made our drive very pleasant. I never was in such a hot house as Broadlands: when one opened the door the air seemed to rush in as from a furnace.

In 1854 we went to Scotland. First to Glenquoich, the house of the gentle Bear Ellice. Why he was nicknamed the 'Bear' I never could tell, except that he had very shaggy eyebrows. He did not resent the appellation, for, like the Master of Bradwardine, he had bears on every possible ornament, and on all the little tools of the writing-table. I was delighted with the beauty and wonderful colouring of the hills and lochs, but not so much with the rain. It came down sometimes in torrents, sometimes in drizzle, day after day, but nobody seemed to mind, and we rowed on the lake with apparent enjoyment, Mrs. Ellice, our kind host's daughter-in-law, singing Scotch songs with the greatest composure under a waterproof cloak and hood. Nothing gave Mr. Ellice more pleasure than if a guest asked at what time the post came in. He would turn to his daughter-in-law and say: 'Jeanie, when did the post come last? was it yesterday, or some day last week?' and enjoy the consternation of his visitors. Among the guests were Sir William and Lady Molesworth. He was extremely pleasant, simple, and kind, and she was good-nature itself and a very accommodating travelling companion.

From Glenquoich we went to Dunrobin. Mr. Ellice frightened me by saying that going to Dunrobin was as bad as going to Court. Our visit, however, was most agreeable. It was in the days of Harriet, Duchess of Sutherland, the Mistress of the Robes and friend of the Queen. No one could be more kind or more successful in setting her visitors at ease. She was still very handsome. We used to breakfast in a gallery overlooking the sea, the pipers playing under the window. The Duchess always appeared in the morning in a white muslin gown and white shoes, a lace cap covered with beetles' wings and a pearl necklace. The costume would have been trying to most people, but it suited the wearer. The weather had cleared up, and the sun shone brilliantly. Nothing can equal the beauty of those Highland homes; there is so much variety on sea and land—the very flowers, growing down to the shore, bloom more vividly than elsewhere.

We next went to Keir, where we also had a very pleasant time. Few men were so interesting as our host, Stirling of Keir, author of the delightful 'Cloister Life of Charles V.' At Keir we fell in with the Molesworths again, and we travelled together to Inverary. In consequence of various misadventures, we approached Inverary at midnight. We rowed across the loch and walked round and round the castle, trying to effect an entrance. We had long been given up, and we ought to have been ashamed of ourselves for our untimely arrival, but we were so fascinated by the grandeur of the scene that we were not, I fear, sufficiently penitent.

We visited Scotland again in 1862; this time we went to the Lowlands—to Sir Edward Colebrooke's in Lanarkshire, and to Hartrigg, where Lord Campbell (then Lord-Chancellor) lived. Lord Campbell was never so happy as when walking over his fields and admiring the broad blue expanse of his swedes. He was a valued friend of my father's. He and Lady Stratheden would often walk over to call on us on Sunday afternoons, and Stratheden House parties were most agreeable. We were going to dine with him a few months after our visit to Hartrigg, when we heard of his sudden death. It was a happy ending to a happy and successful life, but a great loss to all who knew him.

My father always kept up his connection with Oxford. After Dr. Hampden became Bishop of Hereford, we generally stayed with the Master of Pembroke, Dr. Jeune. Besides his great liking for the place and people, Mr. Senior twice held the Professorship of Political Economy, and he never failed to run down to vote on the Liberal side whenever a question of interest arose. He was indignant at the treatment received by Dr. Jowett, whom he greatly liked and admired. The Jeunes' house was extremely entertaining; they collected the cleverest and most amusing people whenever a great function was going on. In 1860 we went to Pembroke with Mme. Mohl, who was a great admirer of Dr. Jeune, at that time Vice-Chancellor of the University. 'The Monseigneur is mighty agreeable,' she used to say.

My father never failed to call on his old President, Dr. Routh. I remember the last time he went. I accompanied him to the door, and met him again when he came out. The President was then ninety-nine. When my father bid him good-bye, he said, 'I shall never see you again; I shall not live to a hundred.' He died a few months afterwards.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONVERSATIONS IN WALES, LONDON, AND SCOTLAND.

IT was not Mr. Senior's practice to keep a journal in his own country. But on his way to Ireland, in 1852, he made notes of the conversation at Harpton, and again in London during the Ministerial crisis of 1855, and also on a visit to Lord Aberdeen in Scotland in 1856. These conversations were not, of course, included in the Continental journals already published; but a few extracts appeared some years ago in the Liberal Unionist and the Nineteenth-Century. They are far too interesting, I think, to exist only in such an ephemeral fragmentary form, so I include them in the present publication, believing that they will add greatly to its value. The lapse of time has enabled these papers to be published in extenso.

JOURNAL IN 1852.

In February, 1852, Lord John Russell had recently become Premier, Sir George Grey Home Secretary, Lord Granville Foreign Secretary, and Lord Grey Minister for the Colonies.

A short time before the meeting of Parliament,

Lord John had caused the retirement of Lord Palmerston, on account of an alleged conversation with the French Ambassador, in which Lord Palmerston expressed a too favourable opinion of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état.

On February 16 the newly-formed Ministry broke up, in consequence of the defeat of a Bill for reorganizing the Militia. Lord John considered the adverse vote as a vote of want of confidence, and resigned. A new Ministry was formed by Lord Derby in March. Lord Malmesbury was appointed Foreign Secretary, Disraeli Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir John Pakington Minister for Home Affairs.

These are the events referred to in the following pages :

' Friday, August 13, 1852.—We drove from Ludlow twenty-five miles to Harpton Court, Sir Frankland Lewis' place, prettily situated between Old Radnor and New Radnor. During the Border warfare this seems to have been an important pass, and the ancestors of the present family occupied it for centuries before surnames were known in Wales. Our road lay through a charming country, by Richard's Castle, once an important post, but now merely a lofty mound overgrown with gigantic ashes and yews, and Corfe Castle, the seat of Mr. Davis, surrounded by oaks such as are never seen out of England.

' At Harpton we found, besides Sir Frankland and Lady Lewis, George Cornwall Lewis and Lady Theresa, Gilbert Lewis, and Miss A. Gordon.

' In the evening we talked of the prospects of the present Administration. I said that they had made such progress in six months that there was no saying what might be hoped if they could enjoy a year or two more of office ; that they had utterly destroyed Protection, and had made bolder and more extensive reforms, both in Chancery and in Common Law, than had been effected since the Commonwealth ; and therefore that unless they attempted something very monstrous, such as an American War about the Nova Scotia Fisheries, or the destruction of the mixed education of Ireland, or throwing the Poor Rate on the Consolidated Fund, I rather wished them to last for a Session or two.

“ There is no chance,” said Sir Frankland, “ of their committing either of the two first blunders. Now that they see the storm which their mischievous meddling has excited in the States, and have time to reflect on the utter worthlessness of the object for which they have risked a war which would ruin our manufactures and stop our emigration, they will back out at any sacrifice of dignity, or consistency, or honour. Nor is Lord Derby, with all his rashness, likely to aid in destroying the system of education of which, though not the inventor, he was the father, at least by adoption. With respect to the Poor Rates, there is more danger. Disraeli has promised to enrich the farmers and landlords by a new adjustment of taxation, and what new adjustment he can make, except by throwing local charges on the national income, it is difficult to guess. I do not attach much importance to the mere fact of his having proposed this scheme when he was in Opposition. But he must know that that proposal is not forgotten ; and when he uttered his vague promises of agricultural relief, he must have known that this is the form in which his hearers would embody them. To attempt such a thing, without doubt, would be both wickedness and folly ; but to raise hopes, and not to attempt it, would be gratuitous folly."

"I have no fears on that subject," said George Lewis. "In the first place, no Chancellor of the Exchequer willingly removes any charge from a local fund, for which he is not responsible, to a national fund, which he has to raise and to economise. In the second place, a national fund must be administered by national agents. The country gentlemen would not bear to have the management of their parishes and unions put into the hands of Government officers. Then Ireland and the poorer districts of Scotland oppose unsurmountable obstacles. In Ireland and in Scotland public opinion is now formed by the rate-payers. The amount of relief is proportional to the small means of those who give it, and to the humble expectations of those who receive it. But once let it come from the Consolidated Fund—that is to say, let it come from the pockets of the English—and justice for Ireland will instantly require the Irish pauper to be put on a footing with the English pauper. No Irish patriot could endure that his countrymen should be fed by the State on potatoes and water while the Englishman has white bread and beer, that one should get from the Imperial Exchequer half a crown a week and the other only elevenpence. Then the workhouse restrictions, the confinement, the separation of the sexes, the prohibition of stimulants, which are maintained for the benefit of the Irish landlord and occupier, would be swept away by public indignation as soon as they could be denounced as cruelties perpetrated for the protection of the English taxpayer. The whole population would throw itself on public relief. Now, though I rate perhaps as lowly as you do the wisdom of this Cabinet, I cannot but think that as soon as they looked into the details of a national poor rate, this result would occur to them, and I do not believe them mad enough to risk it.

“ But though I do not fear the specific acts of maladministration which Senior has enumerated, I cannot join in his wish that the life of this Administration should be prolonged. It is an Administration totally without principle, refusing to put in practice what it pretends to support in theory, bound together and bound to office only by the vulgarest and lowest motives—the love of place, or of patronage, or of money. If a party be allowed to remain in power without any policy, or, if it have a policy, without attempting to act on it, to ask for support in one place as the friends of Protection, and to disarm opposition in another by treating Free Trade as a fait accompli, the people of England will become as indifferent to Parliamentary Government—at least, to Parliamentary Government on the existing system—as those of France were. Senior says that they have made enormous progress in six months. I fear that in twelve months more they may make still greater progress. Their conduct during the last election has advanced the ballot by fifty years. Their conduct during the next session may do as much for radical reform.

Nothing is so dangerous in this country as a weak Tory Government and a strong Whig and Radical Opposition. The former is always irresolute, and the latter unscrupulous. 'The Tories in office and the Whigs in power' was an excellent arrangement in Lord Liverpool's time, when the great object was to keep the carriage moving; but not now, when the difficulty is to prevent our being run away with."

"What," I said, "is your scheme for a substitute?"

"What I should prefer," said Sir Frankland, "is Lord Lansdowne as Premier, and Lord John and Lord Palmerston as members of his Cabinet. It is said that Palmerston no longer requires the Foreign Office, and that the Queen does not object to him if placed in any other."

"But," I said, "when a man has shown himself, not for one year or on one occasion, but for twenty years and on twenty occasions, utterly wrong-headed in the management of the department which he is supposed to understand best, is it safe to trust him in any other?"

"Whether safe or not," said George Lewis, "it must be done. He is so adroit and so popular with one of the most active sections of the House, that no Liberal Administration that excluded him could stand. Recollect with what an absence of effort he turned out Lord John in February. Lord John is perhaps less formidable in Opposition, but no one would think of forming a Whig Cabinet and leaving out of it a man of his wide views and resolute character, and of his experience and skill as a leader and debater. Then all the principal members of the party are connected with him by blood, or alliance, or friendship. I agree with my father that Lord John and Palmerston are indispensable, and as neither would serve under the other, we must look for a third man as Premier, and no one is comparable to Lord Lansdowne if he can be persuaded to accept."

"What alarms me," I said, "in our present Administration, and is enough to make me retract my half-wish that it may, on certain conditions, last for a session or two, is the state of the Foreign Office. And this is unhappily the department in which the greatest harm and the most irremediable harm can be done, and with the least warning. The minute of Council, which throws the moral government of our schools into the hands of the clergy, and the proclamation against the use of the Roman Catholic official dress, were indeed mischievous; but the one can be recalled, and the other, now that it has done its duty as an electioneering claptrap, will be allowed to sleep. But a blunder in a treaty is generally incurable: a claim which is ill-founded, or is not worth the risk of enforcing it, can seldom be abandoned without dishonour. While our merchants and manufacturers are spreading their wings in reliance on permanent peace, the Foreign Office may be brewing a storm which, even if it blow over, will not blow over without costing millions in alarm and insecurity."

'Saturday, August 14.—We set out in a great cavalcade—Sir Frankland, Miss Gordon, Miss Lister, George Lewis, Lady Theresa, and I—to ride to "Water-break-its-neck," and thence over the lofty downs forming a part of the high naked country called Radnor Forest.

‘Our progress through New Radnor was impeded by voters and canvassers who had to be greeted and thanked. Lord Fitzwilliam has just offered G. Lewis his interest at Peterborough, vacant by the death of Watson.

“It may be a safer seat,” said Lady Theresa, “but I shall always regret Herefordshire. It is impossible to stand twice for a county without forming ties which it is painful to feel even relaxed. So many sacrifices have been made for us, so much energy has been exerted, so much kindness and even affection has been shown, that I cannot fancy entertaining for the burgesses of Peterborough the gratitude and love which I feel for the freeholders of Hereford.”

‘Water-break-its-neck is a paraphrase of a shorter Welsh name. It is formed by a mountain torrent, which, after struggling through a narrow gorge, throws itself over a precipice of seventy or eighty feet. It is pretty, but scarcely deserves a place in a guide-book. The day was hazy, but from the high ridges over which we passed we saw a great extent of wild undulating hills, the scenes from which Murchison collected his “Silurian” theory.

‘We are scarcely yet in Wales. I hear no Welsh spoken, and both the Church services are performed in English.

“I never,” said Sir Frankland, “countenance the Eisteddfods and other contrivances for keeping up the use of Welsh. Want of English is the cause that principally keeps down the people of Wales. It excludes them from domestic service, it prevents their employment in the English towns, it indisposes them to emigration ; if they enter the army, it prevents their rising above the lowest rank ; in short, it is a badge and a cause of inferiority. But the clergy discourage English, because, as long as it continues to be necessary for a clergyman to speak Welsh, Welshmen have a monopoly in the Welsh livings.

‘Sunday, August 15.—We went to the churches of New Radnor and Old Radnor. They are built on rising ground on opposite sides of the valley, apparently rather as fortresses than for parochial worship. When Radnorshire ceased to be a Border county, Old Radnor, perched half-way up a barren hill, was almost abandoned, and the beautiful church, now without a congregation, is falling into decay.

‘In the evening Sir Frankland gave us a eulogium on the Rebecca rioters. “Their cause,” he said, “was good. The multiplication of turnpikes was a stupid oppression. They were so numerous and so heavy that they defeated their own object. On many roads the traffic almost ceased, or was insufficient to pay the expense of collection. They fell into bad repair, and became dissociabiles, impediments to intercourse, instead of promoters. The magistrates, to whom the farmers looked up as their natural protectors, were the creditors of the trusts, and maintained their excessive tolls, thinking that they thus kept up the value of their own securities. The people saw that their only remedy was to take the law into their own hands. The Rebecca conspiracy was organized with such skill and carried through with such fidelity, that, though it seemed omnipresent, none of its members were detected. One of my men said to me, ‘Sir, we are all of us Rebeccas.' It never was diverted from its original purpose, it did no more mischief than was absolutely necessary for that purpose, and the instant that purpose seemed likely to be attained—that is to say, the instant that an inquiry into the Welsh turnpike system was instituted by the Government—the association was dissolved, and no one has ever proposed its renewal. The Rebecca riots are a very creditable portion of Welsh history.”’

[Mr. Senior left Harpton on his way to Ireland* the next day.]

JOURNAL IN 1855.

Lord Derby's Ministry fell in December, 1852, and was succeeded by that of Lord Aberdeen, who was still in office when the Crimean War broke out.

The long peace which England had enjoyed had thrown our war machinery out of gear, and in 1854 there was no Iron Duke to impose his will upon conflicting counsellors.

The sufferings of our army during the winter of 1854-55 roused the utmost indignation and sympathy at home. Soon after the meeting of Parliament in January, 1855, Lords Lyndhurst and Ellenborough in the Lords, and Mr. Roebuck in the Commons, gave notice of motions which amounted to censure of the Government, and on the 25th Lord John Russell, the President of the Council, astonished his colleagues and the public by announcing that he had placed his resignation in the hands of Lord Aberdeen.

* His Irish journal was published in 1868.

Mr. Senior was in London at the time, and took the following notes of the curious Ministerial crisis which ensued :

' Sunday, January 28, 1855.—I dined with Edward Ellice and met Lord Leicester, Lord Yarborough, and General Ellice. Ellice believes, and rather wishes, that the Ministry may be defeated to-morrow.

““ But,” I said, “will it be possible to carry on the war with such a committee sitting?”

““ Of course not,” he answered ; “ Roebuck’s motion is merely a vote of want of confidence disguised. On Tuesday the Ministry will resign, and the order for the committee will be discharged.”

““ This,” I said, “is one of the few cases in which the Queen can choose her Ministers.”

““ Certainly,” answered Ellice, “the country will support, for a time, any post or log whom she allows to call himself Premier. If she sends for Lord Derby, he will have a working majority ; so will Palmerston, so will Clarendon, so perhaps would the best of them—Grey.”

““ What do you expect ?” I asked.

““ I think,” he answered, “that she will send for Palmerston. He must lead the House, and cannot do so if he is Minister of War ; no man could endure the double labour. I do not think that Lord John can return. He has too deeply disgusted his friends by deserting them in the moment of danger, or rather of defeat. Of course the Duke of Newcastle* goes ; perhaps Lord Lansdowne may be persuaded to remain.”

* The Secretary at War.

‘I showed to him a letter of Tocqueville’s, of which the following is an extract :

‘COMPIÈGNE,

‘January 22, 1855.

“ Je vois, comme vous, avec une extrême satisfaction les bons sentiments qui règnent entre nos deux armées au Crimée. Il m’en arrive chaque jour, comme à vous, de nouvelles preuves, et ce résultat dépasse mes espérances. Mais je ne suis pas aussi content de la manière dont vous menez la guerre en Angleterre. Les Anglais se trompent s’ils ne voient pas que ce qui se passe en ce moment a très sensiblement diminué leur puissance morale dans le monde. Je suis très frappé de cela, et c’est pour cela que je vous le dis, quoique ce soit là une vérité peu agréable à dire. J’en ai tous les jours la preuve. Elle s’est offerte surtout avec une grande force à moi dans un voyage que je viens de faire à Paris, où j’avais besoin de me rendre pour une affaire, et où je me suis mis en rapport avec toutes sortes de personnes d’opinions diverses.”

‘Ellice does not attach to Tocqueville’s remarks so much importance as I do.

““We never pretended,” he said, “to be a great military power on land. We never can be one unless the House of Commons will allow us to forget that we are an island protected by our navy, and will allow us to spend five or six millions a year on our peace establishments.”

‘The two peers, Whigs as they are, were anxious for the defeat of the Ministry.

“Don't be uneasy,” said Ellice, “they will be beaten by two to one.”

‘Monday, January 29.—I breakfasted with Lord Lansdowne. He asked me what was the impression produced by Lord John's resignation.

‘I said that it was universally disapproved; that it was compared to a resignation by Lord Raglan the day before the battle of the Alma.

“It came upon us,” said Lord Lansdowne, “like a thunder-clap in fair weather. No one thought it possible. I perhaps had a right to be the most surprised, for when the War Department was created I was anxious to put Palmerston there instead of the Duke of Newcastle, and was overruled by Lord John and Lord Aberdeen. When the head of the Whigs and the head of the Peelites united in preferring the Duke, I did not think that I could decently persist.”

‘Lord Lansdowne surprised me by his expectation that the Queen would send for Lord Derby, and that a Derby Cabinet was possible. Lords Ellenborough and Malmesbury, he said, are his great difficulties. Disraeli is ready to accept whatever may be offered to him, but Ellenborough demands the War Department, and Malmesbury will claim the Foreign Office. Malmesbury might, perhaps, be satisfied if he were sent to Paris, and Lord Cowley removed to Downing Street, but we could ill afford to lose Cowley in Paris. Nor could we well spare Clarendon here. His management of our foreign affairs appears to me to have been as nearly perfect as an administration—which, of course, is often only a choice of dangers—can be. If the Queen wished to punish Lord John, she should send for him as the destroyer of the present Cabinet, and offer him carte blanche to form a new one.

“What do you hear said,” he added, “of the Duke of Newcastle?”*

“I hear,” I answered, “that he is perfectly honest and very laborious, but very slow, and very indecisive, as a man anxious to do what is right, but without knowledge of principles, or fertility of resources, always must be. The worst fault imputed to him is an affinity for fools, such that if he were dipped into a crowd he would come out richly encrusted with all the folly that came in contact with him. Whether that be owing to his preferring fools to men of sense, or to his inability to distinguish between them, and the excess in the world of folly over intelligence, my informants do not venture to decide. The consequence, I am told, is that all the departments which he has anything to do with are full of incapacity. As there is nothing that an incapable man dreads like responsibility, all his officials try to escape it by tossing the duty of deciding, and even the duty of giving an answer, from one department, or from one branch of a department, to another.”

“In the Cabinet,” said Lord Lansdowne, “the Duke always appeared to be very diligent and perfectly frank, always ready to state fully what he was doing and why he was doing it. The worst managed department, I am told, is the Ordnance. Lord Raglan, the Master-General, is absent, so is Burgoyne, the Lieutenant-General, and the business is managed by old officers, men of prejudices and routine, who stop everything. As for Burgoyne, they write to me from the Crimea that he has been a good man."

* My father did not know the Duke of Newcastle personally at this time.

"That is just," I said, "what I hear of Lord Hardinge. I am told that he has become irresolute and timid, and that his memory has failed. Bitter complaints, too, are made of the medical department."

"Is it true," I asked, "that Palmerston was objected to for the War Department, lest Austria should be offended?"

"I do not believe it," said Lord Lansdowne. "Austria must be as anxious as we are for our rapid success, and for the man that gives us the best chance of it. But years have told even on Palmerston. He dined with me yesterday, and I never saw a man so terrassé. One thing is certain. He cannot be War Minister and lead the House."

"I should like," I said, "to see the House led by Sidney Herbert."

"So should I," said Lord Lansdowne. "He is a man of the world, he is conciliatory, he is an excellent speaker, he is very honest, his heart is in his duties. He has not Gladstone's genius—and who has?—but he is a much better manager of men."

"I wish," I said, "that we could put our army under Canrobert."

"I wish we could," said Lord Lansdowne. "The forces would be much better distributed. Up to the present time the attack has been divided between the two armies, and we have had much more than our share, considering the disproportion of our numbers. If the army were considered as one, and one General were responsible, the fatigue would be more equitably shared. And I have no doubt that the French would put their fleet under our Admiral."

"I am inclined," I said, "to believe that, in the present state of opinion, such a change is possible. Everybody is prepared for something new, or, rather, anxious and eager for something new. And certainly an English army commanded by a Frenchman would satisfy the most voracious appetite for novelty."

"You complain," said Lord Lansdowne, "as everyone else does, of our bad military appointments, but where are the good men to be found? An old friend of mine, a retired military man, wrote to me from the country, to complain of our inefficient Generals and military administrators. I called on him when he came to town with the Army List in my hand, and we went over all the names; after a couple of hours we found only two men on whom we could rely; one of them, MacMurdo, has since been employed. Of course I do not mean to say, nor do I believe, that many more might not have been discovered, but those two were all whom our joint knowledge of military men enabled us to select."

"Might it not have been well," I said, "to try Major Edwardes?*" He is young, and he has a high reputation."

"I saw a good deal of him," answered Lord Lansdowne, "when he was in England. But what I saw did not lead me to venture to advise so strong a measure as the sending for him from India."

"Of course," I said, "the source of our military incapacity is our detestable military education.* My brother, Colonel Senior, who long commanded the 65th, has often described to me the incompetence of his officers. No one, he says, until he becomes a captain, ever thinks of attending to his duties, except on compulsion. If he were to be detected trying to learn his business, or trying to do anything but shirk it, he would lose caste. 'I myself,' said my brother, 'did the same while I was ensign and lieutenant. As captain a man feels a little more responsible, but it is not till he is a field officer that he really exerts himself. If I were again in the army, and had the command of a regiment with full powers, I should like to send away all the subalterns, and employ sergeants and corporals in their places. They are much better, and more intelligent. I would dismiss the captains, too, if it were not necessary to keep them to manage the payment of the men. You must have a gentleman for money matters.'"

* Sir Herbert Edwardes.

'I was in the House in the evening and met there Hayter. We discussed before the debate the chances of the next Administration.

"Nothing," said Hayter, "can stand without Lord John. He and his seventy or eighty adherents will pull to pieces any Government in which he does not lead." Hayter laughed at the leadership of Sidney Herbert. "He wants," said Hayter, "both intellectual force and followers. He is a ready, elegant debater, not a gladiator."

'Knowing the severity of Roebuck's illness, I was surprised at the vigour and clearness of his first sentences. He was more audible than Lord John or Lord Palmerston. I was grieved, therefore, when he suddenly hesitated and, after a minute's pause, declared his inability to go on, and sat down.

* All this is changed now.

'On my return I found Marochetti in the drawing-room. He is alarmed by our treaty with Piedmont.

'“It delighted me,” I said, “since it saved you from Austria, and Austria from you.”

'“So far so good,” said Marochetti, “but it may be interpreted as a sale by Cavour of 15,000 of his countrymen for a loan of two millions.”

'“The two millions,” I said, “are lent merely to pay the expense of the expedition.”

'“No,” said Marochetti, “they are not wanted for that purpose. You pay the expenses. They are intended to supply the deficit occasioned by Cavour's reduction of duties. Such an opinion, if it becomes general, will do great harm to our Government, and great harm to you. I doubt whether our Ministry, or even our throne, could stand the odium of such a transaction, and I doubt whether the French will stand by you if they think that you are going to fight with mercenaries while they are spending their lives. You know, of course, that you are the object of jealousy, that you are le voisin riche whom everyone envies. Let it be supposed that you think yourselves ‘trop grands seigneurs pour vous battre,’ and even Louis Napoleon will scarcely be able to retain your alliance.”

'“You must recollect,” I said, “that we do not profess to be a military power on land. We are a great naval power, and we have a small army, the best for mere fighting in the world. We can give an invaluable auxiliary force, but we are not fit for a campaign, at least as principals. We can send a contingent, and we can equip an expedition, but we never ought to attempt anything more. We were forced into the Portuguese and Spanish campaigns, because no one else could get to Spain or Portugal. We were forced into the campaign of 1815 because we were almost on the spot. But these were temerities not to be repeated. We ought not to have embarked as principals in this Eastern expedition. We ought to have been satisfied with sending an auxiliary force, to act under the General-in-Chief St. Arnaud."

'My daughter-in-law wrote to Massimo d'Azeglio and mentioned the substance of Marochetti's remarks.

'This is a copy of Azeglio's answer :

"Comment donc! On dit que nous donnons nos soldats pour nous procurer de l'argent? Mais c'est absolument à l'envers qu'il faut dire! Nous nous procurons de l'argent, pour pouvoir vous donner nos soldats et notre sang! Criblés de dettes comme nous sommes, avec la maladie de la vigne, le choléra, la stagnation du commerce, la diminution de la rentrée de l'impôt indirect, avec un déficit de 28 millions sur le budget, le moyen de mettre une armée en campagne sans trouver de l'argent? Et sur les 28 millions de francs dont il s'agit (je parle de ceux dont on nous facilitera l'emprunt) croyez-vous que nous y gagnerons quelque chose, si nos soldats doivent être bien vêtus, bien nourris, et ne pas aller mourir de misère au Crimée comme il arrive aux vôtres ? Ce n'est pas pour faire une spéculation de bourse que nous nous engageons dans la guerre actuelle, mais bien parce que la politique traditionnelle du Piémont et de la maison de Savoie, est de prendre part à tout ce qui se fait d'important en Europe ; parceque au jour du péril commun notre épée n'a jamais dormi dans le fourreau ; parce qu'un petit pays comme le nôtre, s'il veut avoir une place honorable dans la famille des nations, doit payer d'énergie et de courage, et faire plus que ne comporte sa force réelle ; parce qu'enfin depuis huit siècles notre dynastie n'a grandi que par la guerre, et que si, pendant qu'on se bat pour la liberté du monde nous restions là à regarder, les os de nos pères sortiraient de terre pour nous assommer. Voilà pourquoi nous avons accédé à votre traité d'alliance, ma chère amie et alliée.

“ Nous sommes, Dieu merci, encore assez bons gentilshommes, de bonne race, pour savoir donner notre sang quand il le faut, sans songer à le vendre. Et permettez-moi d'ajouter que c'est d'autant plus méritoire à nous d'aller combattre à vos côtés, que (n'en déplaise à vos ministres) jamais guerre au monde n'a été plus bravement combattue, ni plus bêtement conduite, que la guerre de Crimée, et nous avons le droit de prévoir que le sang de nos soldats payera pour l'ignorance des chefs. Mais c'est égal ; on se bat pour la justice, pour l'honneur du drapeau ; on nous appelle — nous voilà ! et s'il faudra mourir, on mourra.”

‘ Tuesday, January 30.—‘ Frederic Elliot* called on us. He had just come from Lord John. Lord John defends himself for not having made more public among his colleagues his objection to the Duke by saying that, having urged it in the proper quarter—to Lord Aberdeen—he thought that he had done enough; that to mention it to the other members of the Cabinet would have been a sort of cabal. “I might,” he said, “have resolved to fight the battle on Thursday; I might have told the proper lies and used the proper sophistry, and have gone out on Friday, after having been beaten, with the grace of fidelity. But what would have been my situation if we were not beaten?—if we had had on Friday, as we had six weeks ago, a majority of thirty-nine? Ought I to have remained a member of a Government which cannot, or will not, conduct well the war? And how could I quit it after having successfully defended it? What would have been the contrast between my defence of the Duke on Thursday and my defence of myself on Friday? I ought, perhaps, to have gone sooner, but I could not stay longer.”

* Under Secretary at the Colonial Office.

“What I complain of,” continued Elliot, “is that we abuse the traitor while we delight in the treason. Everyone breathes more freely since Tuesday; everyone feels that the first step out of the path that was leading to ruin has been taken; we all admit that Lord John has rendered an immense public service, and we all cry out against him. I confess that he ought to have resigned in November. But the kindness of his nature made him put off and put off a separation from the friends of his whole life. He hoped that things might mend, that it might be possible for the party to retreat with less dishonour. I do not say that these excuses are sufficient. I acknowledge that they are not, but I wish the blame which he deserves to be properly assessed. I wish him to be reproached, not for resigning on January 24, which was a great and meritorious act, but for remaining in office after November 16, which was a weak and mischievous act.

““ Lord John’s silence is pushed to an excess rare among public men. I am inclined to think that he distrusts his own powers of resisting persuasion, and therefore will not take counsel with anyone, except his wife and his relations. This gives to all that he does an appearance of precipitation even when he is right. Then he judges men in gross much better than he does men in detail. I do not trust his opinion as to A. or B., but he has an instinctive prescience as to what will be the feeling and the conduct of the House of Commons.”

““ His ignorance of men in detail,” I said, “probably arises from his not mixing with them. How can a man who talks to no one but his wife and his sisters, and his brother and brothers-in-law, and his cousins, know where to find good men, or, indeed, know good men when he stumbles on them? I admit that he knows instinctively the temper of the House of Commons, but he cannot know that of the country, or he would not make such enormous blunders. He would not have written his Durham letter, or introduced his Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, or his detestable £5 Franchise Reform Bill.”

““ We laugh at that reform now,” said Elliot, “and I have no doubt that its immediate effects would have been mischievous ; but do we know what may be in store for us ? Do we know that it was not a Sybil's book ? The country is now calm and prosperous. The war is felt only in the Income Tax ; the high prices please our farmers and landlords, and are met by good wages and ample employment. Yet there is a growing discontent with our institutions. We are tired of our ducal Ministers, and of Lord Raglan and his noble incompetents. How will it be if we have a panic, or a scarcity ? I do not foresee a revolution of the earthquake kind, a revolution that shall ruin the public creditor, exile the aristocracy, and pull down Holland House ; but I foresee some great change. I do not think that the present system can last twenty years. It may explode in five, or in one."

' In the evening I went to the House of Lords, to hear Lord Grey's admirable speech on military reform. When the debate was over, Lord Aberdeen came to me before the throne. I told him that I had just left Tenby, and that my brother-in-law, to whom he gave the living a few months ago, was justifying his selection.

" " It was lucky," said Lord Aberdeen, " that the vacancy occurred when it did. To-morrow would have been too late."

' No one doubts that the Ministry will be beaten in the Commons by an immense majority, and that Lord Lansdowne will be sent for.

' The defeat of the Government has been more signal than was expected. The majority against them is more than two to one. As Lord Lansdowne (and he alone) expected, Lord Derby has been sent for, but no one expects him to form a Government.

‘Thursday, February 1.—The morning was full of reports. In the evening I went to the House of Lords, and there heard that Lord Derby had failed. The House began to fill before five, and by a quarter after five all the Opposition, and all the Ministry, except Lord Lansdowne, were present. Lord Shelburne told me that he knew nothing, but, from his father’s absence, inferred that he had been sent for. “It is probably,” he added, “as an adviser. In his state of health he hardly can take the Premiership.”

‘Lord Aberdeen’s speech on taking leave of office, and the Duke’s in answer to Lord John’s attack on him in the Commons, were both good; especially the latter, which was delivered with great calmness, sincerity, and good feeling. It was exceedingly well received, particularly the passages in which he defended himself against the accusation of indolence and indifference.

‘Lord Derby’s answer was less successful. It was thought too amusing for the occasion. I dined at Lansdowne House, and met there Lord and Lady Mahon, the Milmans, Lady Mount-Edgumbe, and Lord Somers. Lady Shelburne told me that she came home later than usual, at about half-past six, and found Lord Lansdowne in the agonies of obeying a sudden summons to Windsor. She does not believe that he will venture to accept the Government, though it will be pressed on him. I found her bitter against Lord John. She thinks that he has never been resigned to hold the second place, and that he has destroyed this Cabinet in the hope of leading another. She trusts that Lord Lansdowne will not sit with him again.

‘Friday, February 2.—I have been confined all day by an attack of bronchitis. Elliot called on us. Elliot is in bad spirits.

“What alarms me,” he said, “is not merely the loss of an army; it is not merely the loss of our military character, great as these calamities are; it is the apparent revelation that our system of government is worn out. When the Duke of Wellington, at the time of the Reform Bill, asked how the King’s Government would be carried on, he saw the amount of danger, but not the kind. The reformed House, so far as its mere votes go, is as good an instrument as the old one was—indeed, much better. It has done more good in twenty years than its predecessors did in fifty. Our difficulty is, not to get a majority, but to get a Ministry. Under the old system politics was a profession. Young men were taken up by patrons of boroughs and brought early into public life. Now, there are not ten seats, perhaps not five, into which a public-spirited patron can put a promising young friend. Even our great families, though they can return their sons and nephews, cannot return a stranger. Lord Lansdowne can put Lord Shelburne in for Calne, but cannot put in a man unconnected with his family, even if he were such a man as Macaulay was when he returned him thirty years ago. With the exception of these sons and nephews, our members are middle-aged gentlemen, great landowners, or manufacturers, or the people who have banking-houses in a borough, or villas, with little parks and clipped hedges, near one, and who have not taken to politics, except parish politics, till they were forty or fifty. I spent some time in one of the new manufacturing boroughs in the autumn. 'The man whom we like for a member,' they said, 'is somebody who lives with us, or near us—who can take the chair at our meetings, tell us the London gossip, and hear from us what we think of public affairs. We don't want a man who is too busy to come among us, and thinks our internal affairs a bore, and our political opinions twaddle.' The youngest men in the late Ministry were in Parliament before the Reform Bill, and they have no successors. The great families and their sons and nephews afford too narrow a field of selection, and there are no others who have taken to political life."

"France," I said, "under Louis XVIII. and Louis Philippe was equally without professional politicians, and yet she obtained distinguished statesmen."

"France," he answered, "was governed by men of letters. Journalists, historians and professors were gradually promoted to be ministers and ambassadors. We may have to do the same in England. If our constituencies are to choose for themselves, if we had rather have the member for Calne named by the grocers and butchers of Calne than by Lord Lansdowne, they must choose either their neighbours, or men old enough to have already established their reputations. Literary reputation is more diffused in the country than political reputation, and no literary fame is so wide as that of a writer of narrative. Dickens and Thackeray and Macaulay and Bulwer, or the men who then will fill their literary places, may, perhaps, twenty years hence, occupy the Treasury Bench; but we are not ripe for that yet. In the meantime we are trying over and over the same little knots of ancient gentlemen, and finding them yet more feeble and more quarrelsome every day.

“If I were Minister, I would try something new. If we must lose Sir. J. Graham, I would put Sir Baldwin Walker, or any other good naval man, at the Admiralty, and if he were a parvenu, so much the better. The aristocrats have been tried long enough in vain. I would recall Lord Raglan, and put Sir Colin Campbell or Canrobert in his place.”

‘Sunday, February 4.—I am still confined to the house, and hear only what my visitors tell me.

‘The news of to-day is that, Lord Lansdowne’s negotiations having failed, the Queen sent for Lord John, and that he is still charged with the commission. It is said that Herbert and Gladstone refused to join him, that Palmerston is ready to serve, but fears the fatigue and responsibility of the War Department. Elliot thinks that Panmure must have it. He is an intelligent second-rate, bold, honest, and fond of society, and therefore more accustomed to men than the Duke.

‘Elliot regrets deeply that Lord John has accepted the task of forming a Government. In the first place, it kept him from the House on Friday, and prevented his defending himself, which he says that he can do triumphantly, against the Duke’s attack. The accusations, therefore, have three days to circulate and implant themselves. In the second place, it gives plausibility to the charge that his conduct is the result, not of public spirit, but of ambition.

“I do not believe,” said Elliot, “that charge. I believe Johnny to be eminently honest, straightforward, and public-spirited. But those who do not know him well—that is to say, all England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the exception of some twenty of his relations and connections—will believe that he has been intriguing against Lord Aberdeen ever since he joined him. He had it in his power to act disinterestedly and patriotically, to say to the Queen: ‘Palmerston is the man demanded by the public, and I am willing to serve under him.’ But his little family clique tell him that he is the only man to save the country; he talks to no one else, and believes them. Palmerston is wiser. With claims far superior to Lord John’s, he accepts office under him cheerfully, even cordially.

“As to the secession,” he added, “of Herbert and Gladstone, it is a great blow to the future Government and a prodigious accession to the Tories. But I am not sure that it is a loss to the country. If Gladstone had remained, he could only have made a loan and raised the Income Tax to 10 per cent. The new Chancellor of the Exchequer can do that as well as he could. And we may find a Secretary of War as good as Sidney Herbert, or we may abolish the office by merging it in the Department. We have been trying, without great success, a strong Ministry and a weak Opposition. Now we shall have a strong Opposition. Perhaps if we had had one sooner, we might have escaped some of our present disasters.”

“Will Gladstone,” I said, “oust Disraeli? Will he be able, as soon as he crosses the floor of the House, to assume the command of his old enemies?”

“Not immediately,” said Elliot. “He will at first take a neutral position. He will protect the Government, but from time to time candidly admit its shortcomings, and gradually, from damaging them by his support, will slide into damaging them by his attacks until Dizzy is deposed, and Herbert and Gladstone and Cardwell become the leaders of the Opposition, without anybody’s knowing how it was done.”

“Dizzy,” I said, “will scarcely submit to be so blandly absorbed. If the Tories throw him off he will return to his early love, the Radicals.”

“He may try it,” said Elliot, “but he will fail. They will not accept him. He is purely a rhetorician, and a rhetorician powerful only in attack. He wants knowledge, he wants the habits of patient investigation by which it is to be acquired; he wants sincerity, he wants public spirit, he wants tact, he wants birth, he wants fortune—he wants, in short, nine out of ten of the qualities that fit a man to lead a party. Nothing but the penury of talent among the Tories after the secession of the Peelites gave him importance. If the Peelites rejoin their old associates he is lost.”

‘Henry Bowyer dined with us.

“I do not understand,” he said, “this general wish that Lord John may not be Minister. He may have behaved ill to his colleagues, he may have intrigued against Lord Aberdeen, he may have let the Duke go on until he became intolerable to the country, and have then seized this opportunity to stab the Ministry through him, and to escape himself by turning a sort of king's evidence ; but what has the public to do with all this ? They say that he ought to have retired before. But so ought they all. If you defend them by saying that they did not perceive the Duke's incapacity, that is to save their honesty at the expense of their intelligence. If they did perceive it they acted much worse than he ; for they did not retire till they were kicked out. Lord John has clearly shown more sense, or more patriotism, than any of his colleagues. If the world is ready to take Palmerston or Clarendon, why object to him ?

“As representing the public, all that I wish is to have the war vigorously carried on. I care nothing about the squabbles in the Cabinet. I want the man who can and will fight. Lord John has shown the most willingness to do so. I hope that he also possesses ability.

“It is true that he has not shown it as War Minister, but neither has Lord Palmerston, nor, indeed, anyone else, except, perhaps, Lord Grey.”

Monday, February 5.—We went to the House of Lords to hear Lord Lyndhurst's motion, but, as I expected, it was put off.

‘I went to the Commons, where I found that Lord John had finished his answer to the Duke of Newcastle, and that Gladstone was replying to Lord John. I was told that Lord John's speech was well received, particularly the passage in which he complained that Lord Aberdeen, knowing that the Duke had virtually resigned, had accepted his (Lord John's) resignation, without further explanation, without telling him that the Duke's war-ministry, the ground of his resignation, was over.

'Gladstone's reply was heard coldly, and when he said that Lord Aberdeen could not communicate to Lord John the Duke's intention to resign, because it was only an intention, which he might have revoked, much disapprobation was expressed on each side of the House.

'All sorts of reports are current : one that Palmerston has failed ; another that Lord John is to be in his Cabinet, and that Gladstone will not sit with him ; another that Lord John refuses to serve under Lord Palmerston, either as having been Premier himself, or from a feeling that his present unpopularity would communicate itself to his associate.

'Many persons think Gladstone indispensable. Any other Chancellor of the Exchequer, they say, would be torn to bits by him.

'There is a general impression that this discussion is discreditable to aristocratic institutions ; that the Cabinet seem to think much more of their duty to each other than to the country ; that the Duke was made War Minister on a point of etiquette, merely because he held an office which was called War and the Colonies ; that Lord Aberdeen kept him because he was doing his best, and to remove him would hurt his feelings ; that Lord John did not press his removal, because it would give pain to Lord Aberdeen, and because he, as the head of the Whig section in the coalition, was not the fit person to turn out his Peelite associates ; that the rest of the Cabinet shut their eyes to the Duke's incompetency, because they did not wish to break up the Government. In short, that the only things left unconsidered were the safety of the army and the safety of the country.

‘I hear that the Duke has long been dissatisfied with Lord Raglan, but that, with the characteristic politeness of an aristocratic Minister, instead of recalling or reproving him, he has administered only kind notes of advice.

‘I walked for some time in Westminster Hall with Layard.*

“‘I hear,” he said, “that Lord John tells everybody that it was my speech that opened his eyes to the state of our army.”

‘Wednesday, February 7.—Dr. Jeune,† the Master of Pembroke, breakfasted with us. He is in attendance on the Oxford Commission. The purpose for which it was supposed to have been created, the purpose to which the powers given to it point, is to make the reforms which the colleges are unwilling or unable to effect by themselves. But the men have been so ill and so perversely selected, that it seems likely to be an obstructive instead of a motive power.

‘The most active members, Judge Coleridge and Awdrey, are timid Puseyites, full of prejudices and of scruples, talking of the wishes of the founder and of the claims of property, and would keep the colleges clerical almshouses for those born in particular counties or parishes, instead of great diffusers of education to all British subjects. Pembroke proposes a thorough reform, gets rid of founders' kin and parochial and school preferences, and of all the follies of the seventeenth century. The commissioners, instead of receiving their improvements with gratitude, are trying to pare them down. The Bishop of Ripon attends little, and when he does attend sympathises with the obstructors. Lord Ellesmere is liberal, but indolent and yielding, and George Cornwall Lewis is absent. The only good man is Johnson, the Dean of Wells, but he is unsupported.

* The Right Honourable Sir Austen Henry Layard, the excavator of Nineveh.

† Afterwards Bishop of Peterborough.

'Jeune told me that he had been with Potter, who, with his partner, Price of Gloucester, had supplied the wooden houses for the Crimea. Potter told him that for three weeks after he had made his proposal to the Duke of Newcastle he got no answer; that he wrote to ask what was to be done, and was told that the paper had been mislaid, and that they wished for a copy of it; that at length the War Department having, after great delay, resolved to have them, they were made and sent by rail to Southampton, but that the contract entered into by the Ordnance ended when they reached the railway terminus; that, after some delay, another contract was entered into for putting them on board of steamers, but that this contract merely heaped them on the deck; that a further contract and a further delay was necessary to get them down into the hold; and he does not believe that at this instant they have got beyond Balaklava. Louis Napoleon sent for Potter to Saint-Cloud to consult about their being supplied to the French army. In a couple of hours the whole matter was arranged between Louis Napoleon and himself. The question then was how soon the execution of it could be begun. This was Saturday. A letter could not get to Gloucester before Monday. Louis Napoleon rang for a courier, gave him fifteen napoleons, and ordered him to be in Gloucester in twenty-four hours. Potter proposed to go to his hotel, write out the contract and specification, and return with them. Louis Napoleon said no, they must be written out immediately ; that he was going out for a couple of hours, and hoped on his return to find all ready. Potter was thus left two hours alone in Louis Napoleon's cabinet, with all his private papers about. The contract, etc., was ready in two hours, was in Gloucester on Sunday, and the workmen were employed in executing it by six o'clock on Monday morning.

'We dined with the Trevelyans, and met there the Booths, Milmans, and Macaulay. We talked no politics, for there are none to talk. Nothing is known, and everybody is tired of guessing. Macaulay spoke with great affection of Lord John.

'Thursday, February 8. — Herbet, the French Consul, and Sir Edward Colebrooke dined with us. Garcia came in the evening. Herbet spoke with deep regret of Faucher* as one of the boldest and most honourable of French statesmen. I asked what was to become of the Crédit Foncier, since it has been absorbed by the Government and put under totally new management.

"I cannot tell," said Herbet ; "but I should be sorry to hold its shares. This totally new management has been an after-thought. The intention of

* Faucher, formerly Minister of the Interior, had just died.

Bineau, the Minister of Finance, was to retain Wolowski, Faucher's brother-in-law, the old directeur, as second in command, and he had consented to serve, but Louis Napoleon personally interfered and ordered his removal."

' This seizure by the Government of the funds of a private commercial company, and delivery of them over into new hands, without consulting those who have lent to it, or borrowed from it, or purchased its shares, is characteristic of the Idées Napoléoniennes.

' Herbert maintains that both Louis Napoleon and Drouyn de Lhuys are Free-traders. I objected to this belief Louis Napoleon's pamphlet on the French sugar duties, which is full of Protection in its worst forms—prohibitions and bounties.

"That," said Herbert, "was before he had been in England. His mind was constantly at work when he was with you, and you will see the fruits of it."

"Drouyn de Lhuys," he said, "has risen in reputation more than any other French statesman. His whole soul is intent on rendering the Anglo-Gallic alliance not a partnership for merely one venture, but a permanent consolidation of interests."

"Does he write," I asked, "many of his State papers?"

"Almost all the important ones," answered Herbert, "which is a deviation from the tradition of our Foreign Office."

' Sir E. Colebrooke saw the battle of the Alma from the deck of the Agamemnon, and remained in the Crimea till after the battle of Balaklava.

' I asked him about Lord Raglan.

“He is gentleman-like,” said Colebrooke, “and brave, but seems to want the power of locomotion. No one ever saw his horse out of a walk. Lyons, who went out with him on a reconnaissance, came back, after having had to walk his horse for five hours, numbed with cold.”

“What were the criticisms,” I asked, “in the camp, as to the battle of the Alma?”

“I cannot answer,” he replied, “as to the camp, but to us in the Agamemnon, it seemed that he charged too soon. When we saw the Zouaves in possession of the heights on the right, we supposed that the Russians, taken in flank, would be easily driven off, but Lord Raglan charged before the French could come to his assistance.

“What do they say,” I asked, “about the charge at Balaklava?”

“They say,” he answered, “that Lord Raglan, who was two miles from the spot, ought not to have given an order which did not obviously allow the officer who was to execute it any discretion. He ought to have known that during the ten minutes which it took Captain Nolan to bear the order things might be altogether altered. The rest of the blame is divided between Nolan, who was rash and violent, and Lord Lucan. The great fault, however, lies with those who gave an important command to the latter.”

“Is it true,” I asked, “that Lord Raglan is invisible?”

“Quite true,” he said. “I have heard of men who were seven or eight weeks in the camp without seeing him. To move seems to give him pain.

“ Our first great blunder,” he continued, “ was commencing the siege with insufficient forces ; our second was turning our whole force on the attack before we had fortified our position and made our road. It is true that we had not men enough to do both, but if the attack had been delayed till we had secured our communications with our base of operations, we should not have been forced to suspend it for want of ammunition, or have seen our men die by thousands for want of proper food, clothing, and shelter.

“ Our third error was dividing the attack into two halves, and taking one for ourselves. This may have been right at first, when the numbers in each army were about equal ; but when the French were doubled and trebled by their reinforcements, and we were reduced to one half by disease, the disproportion in the tasks allotted to the armies respectively became enormous. The greater part of our loss is to be attributed to this. We have not half enough men for the trenches alone, leaving, as to a great degree we do leave, all our other duties unperformed.”

‘ I asked Garcia if he thought that Isabella would keep her throne.

“ Certainly,” he answered. “ We are too wise to incur another war of succession, and whom could we put in her place ? Not Montpensier : our importations of sovereigns from France have never succeeded. Not Montemolin, for he is despised. I have seen the women who sell vegetables and fruit at the end of the day collect the refuse still unsold, and cry out, ‘ Who will buy my Montemolins ? ’ using that term as signifying valueless remnants. Our best hope is to marry our Infanta to the King of Portugal, and unite the crowns, but we fear that you would object. We believe that you wish to keep Portugal in your dependence."

"The dependence of Portugal," I said, "was very useful about fifty years ago, when it enabled us to use the men and the resources of that country to fight your battles. If Portugal had been part of Spain, the Portuguese troops would not have been officered and commanded by Englishmen, and would not have afforded us the auxiliary army that enabled us to drive the French out of Spain. But Portugal now is a mere encumbrance. We have to defend a weak ally, and to countenance a perverse Court. I wish from my heart that you had it."

'Friday, February 9.—The Government is supposed to be constructed, giving the Treasury to Lord Palmerston, War to Lord Panmure, the Home Office to Sidney Herbert, and the Council and lead of the Lords to Lord Granville, keeping every other department as it was. But there is a difficulty as to Roebuck's motion for an inquiry into the management of the war. Herbert says that he will not remain Minister if he is to be under trial; that he cannot conduct the Home Office and conduct his defence, and Gladstone threatens in that case also to retire, not choosing to be the only surviving Peelite. The French Government, too, is said to have sent a strong remonstrance. We cannot inquire into the management of the war by the English without inquiring, to a certain degree, into its management by the French, and for such an inquiry neither the French army nor the French people are prepared. There is also a hitch about Layard. Lord Palmerston is very anxious to have him as Under-Secretary at War. But Admiral Dundas is furious at Layard's letter from the Agamemnon, and until this quarrel is vidé, it is thought that Layard ought not to be put into an important post.

'This seems to me, under present circumstances, a childish objection. If the duties were unimportant, or if we had a single other candidate of equal qualifications, it might be well to keep Layard waiting until he had repelled Dundas' accusations. But he is so obviously pointed out by his peculiar knowledge and by his energy as the best man for the office, and such immense consequences may follow its being well or ill or moderately filled, that I would take him if all, or more than all, Dundas' imputations were established.

'Saturday, February 10.—I am confined by bronchitis. Lord Lansdowne called on me on his way to the Cabinet. We talked of the difficulties of the Government. One is the inquiry. It is impossible to carry it on without showing up our allies in blue-books, the mere idea of which has seriously alarmed the French; and yet the House is pledged to it. Some means of escaping from the pledge must be afforded, perhaps a Commission which need not report till the war is over. Another difficulty is Lord Raglan.

"That he has done ill in some respects, and not so well as he ought to have done in others," said Lord Lansdowne, "is certain. On the other hand, he has shown great military qualities, and—what, without showing great qualities, shows rare ones—he has lived on good terms with the French. Where can we find a man of military and administrative genius, and also of conciliatory temper and manners? Sir Colin Campbell may have the former merit, but he has not the latter. I hear that he is hot-tempered, almost to violence. What would be the consequences of a quarrel between him and Canrobert? To put the whole allied army under one commander would, of course, be the right thing if it could be done. But there would be an outcry against it, perhaps irresistible, and if a calamity followed it would produce a storm which no one could stand. I believe that we must keep Lord Raglan, requiring a complete change in his staff, and sending out the best man that we can find to be at its head.

“What would Lord Derby,” I asked, “have done with Lord Raglan?”

“Recalled him,” answered Lord Lansdowne. “Ellenborough is furious against him, and is rash enough for anything.”

February 10.—Still confined by bronchitis. Lord Monteaigle called on us.

“I am glad,” he said, “that this anxious fortnight is over. I grieve over our penury of military talent; I deplore an interregnum of ten days when every minute was valuable, and I lament the fall, perhaps the ruin, of my dear friend John’s political reputation; but the result is good. It is true that years have told on Palmerston, but in some respects they have improved him. His fault will not now be rashness. He has broken off his relations with the press. Foreign Ministers will not now complain, as they used to do, that they find the substance of their conferences in the columns of the Morning Chronicle. And his powers of labour are unimpaired. They are as vigorous and as untiring as ever."

"What sort of a War Minister will Panmure make?" I asked.

"Very good," said Lord Monteaule; "better than a man of greater capacity, Lord Grey. He is accessible to argument; Grey is not. He can change his opinions; Grey cannot. Then he was for fourteen years a regimental officer. He has been poor; he has been kicked about in the world; and he is a good judge of men.

"That was the Duke of York's merit. He was not an able man, but he knew where to find, and how to keep, able men. He took Torrens and Calvert and Fitzroy Somerset, and the others who made our army in the last war."

"What is to be done," I asked, "with the Duchy of Lancaster?"

"I hope," said Monteaule, "that a use will be made of it which no one now suspects. I hope that Johnny will take it."

"But if he joins this Ministry," I said, "will not he be always suspected of being engaged in an intrigue to subvert it? And will not he, in fact, join it as a slave, unable effectually to oppose any of its measures, or effectually to enforce any views of his own, because he cannot again resign?"

"It is true," said Monteaule, "that his position in the Ministry will be a painful one. But what will be his situation if he stands aloof? The leader of a great party—and that he still will be—cannot give to any Government a constant support, unless he is a member of it. Things will be done, and things will be omitted, to his intense disapprobation, without his knowing why. He will not be able to support the Government, because all its motives cannot be explained to him. Sometimes he will stay away, but he will be suspected of prompting his followers to oppose. Sometimes he may be tempted to oppose himself, and woe be to him if he ever succeeds! I cannot conceive a greater misfortune to him than his putting a Liberal Government into a minority. He had better join it in any capacity, and on any terms.”

‘February 12.—Tom Taylor dined with us, and told us that F. Peel is to be the Under-Secretary for the War Department. As Peel’s transfer to the War Department vacates a Colonial Under-Secretaryship, it is hoped that Layard may still be brought in, not precisely for that vacancy, as it would not do to put him under Sidney Herbert (who now takes the Colonies), whose management he has been attacking, but by a further shuffle of the official cards.

‘It seems that there has been a little disturbance in the Cabinet about Windsor. Gladstone desired Hayter to move for the writ for it on Thursday. Hayter demurred, as he was not aware that the Government was prepared with a candidate. Gladstone assured him that all was right, and that the candidate was ready; and he ended by saying that if Hayter would not move for the writ Lord Elcho would. Hayter acquiesced, and moved, and Hope, a Peelite, brother of Hope-Scott, instantly addressed the electors. The Whig members of the Cabinet had not been consulted. They disapprove of Hope, and have sent Sampson Ricardo to oppose him, so that there are now two Government candidates—a Peelite and a Whig—opposing one another.

‘In the summer, before Lord Rosse returned to Ireland, we had a good deal of conversation as to the possibility of attacking Sebastopol with shot-proof boats. I had a letter from him to-day, dated Parsonstown, February 8, from which what follows is an extract :

“As you suggested, I wrote in last June to the Duke of Newcastle, referring him to my letter to Sir J. Burgoyne on the subject of shot-proof ships. I stated to him that—no doubt in common with others—I had been considering in what way the great mechanical and engineering resources of this country could be brought to bear against the Czar, and that my letters to Sir J. Burgoyne were the result.

“Sir J. Burgoyne so far concurred with me, that he thought a target should be at once made, and the experiment at once tried.

“That I had spoken to several Fellows of the Royal Society and eminent engineers, and that they had not suggested any substantial difficulty.

“That there was not the slightest doubt either that iron could be made of strength sufficient to resist cannon-shot till doomsday, or that the sea would be able to carry the weight.

“That a target could be made in a week, and the preliminary experiments at once tried.

“The Duke, however, was too great or too busy to look for aid from science. He did not, so far as I am aware, take the slightest notice of the suggestion.

“At length, in the autumn, when I was about to make a target myself (having procured iron from England for that purpose), I found from the papers that a target had just been made at Portsmouth, at the earnest request, it is said, of the French Government. The result of the experiment, I need hardly say, was strictly in accordance with the result which had been previously attained by theory.

“The Illustrated News and the other London papers have given a detailed description of the floating batteries now, I believe, nearly finished, and of course they have made the Czar acquainted with all that he desires to know.

“By whom these floating batteries were designed and calculated I know not, but I should have made them much stronger and more powerful.

“In what a different position we should now have been with even one floating battery, proof against everything, in the middle of the harbour of Sebastopol. Nothing could have kept it out. What an unequal contest we have engaged in, with the War Minister profoundly ignorant of everything relating to war and its appliances, opposed to the Czar, who, perhaps, of all men in Europe is the best informed on all such matters!

“Ever yours,

“ROSSE.”

‘Henry Phillips, whom I saw in the course of the morning, told me that he had dined yesterday with Scott Russell, who is building an iron vessel, or rather a vessel armed with iron, for the Government. The model, he was told, came from France, and no discretion was given to him. The plates are four inches thick, fitted one to another like bricks, thus  without any of the edges overlapping. The consequence, he says, will be, that a ball hitting an angle may start three or four plates. Assuming four inches to be the proper thickness, on which Scott Russell gave no opinion, he would have had two plates, each two inches thick, so arranged as that the joinings of one set of plates should never coincide with those of another. Whether such a double coating would be sufficient, Scott Russell will not decide, but he is convinced that the single coating, though of four inches thick, is not sufficient. This seems to be also Lord Rosse's opinion.

'Elliot saw yesterday an intelligent traveller just returned from the Crimea.

"No description," said the traveller, "can exaggerate the confusion, want of accommodation, and delays.

"A day or two before I went away it was resolved that the sutlers' booths and warehouses, which fill up more than half of the little wharfage, and ought never to have been allowed to be there, should be removed. All persons interested in the safety of the army were delighted; but the very day that it was to have been executed, an order came down from headquarters, saying that it was hard on the sutlers that their places should be removed without more notice, and giving them leave to remain for a fortnight longer. And this, when their presence materially interferes with landing the supplies on which the lives of our men depend.”

‘He called on Lord Raglan at twelve o’clock, and was told that it was impossible to see him at so early an hour. He went in to Canrobert, and was told that it was many hours too late; that if he wished to see the General he must come at eight. He was there at eight next morning, and found Canrobert surrounded by his staff, having just finished his morning’s work, and ready to ride with him round the works.’

‘February 14.—I have cut out of the Spectator a letter the authorship of which will be evident to the initiated.*

[Translated Extract.]

‘COMPIÈGNE,

‘February 6, 1855.

“... But to talk of more important topics, or, rather, of the all-important one, the war. My mind is continually dwelling with painful interest on the situation of your brave army—an interest inspired by admiration for the army itself, as well as by the concern which I feel for the honour and credit of your institutions, now in some danger of falling into disrepute through incapable and inexperienced administration. . . . If you do not succeed in repairing the mischief, and that quickly (which indeed seems to me next to impossible), England and her Government will assuredly come out of this struggle somewhat discredited, whatever may be the ultimate results of the war, and of the heroic achievements of your soldiers.

* Tocqueville, writing from his father’s house at Compiègne.

“ I have a difficulty in believing that this will not have a considerable influence, though one, perhaps, little foreseen, upon the future course of your domestic affairs. I suspect that it will accelerate the pace at which you appear to be departing from the character of aristocratic government, according to the old acceptation of that term. At any rate, it is impossible but that the English must discern the immense advantages which in time of war attend a centralized government, or that they can be long in contact with an army where everyone can and may become an officer without its producing upon them a serious impression. Your army can hardly avoid undergoing a sort of revolution, and a revolution in the constitution of the army will surely not be confined to the army alone. You are the only people of the present day (except, perhaps, the Russians, and they less than you) who are officered exclusively by gentlemen. You will discover that an army commanded solely by gentlemen is not necessarily the best army to make war with ; it is better able to fight than to sustain itself before and after the battle. We have had good reason to know this under our old monarchy. On the other hand, an army commanded by gentlemen has the advantage of being good against revolutions ; while an army of the opposite character either makes revolutions or suffers them to be made by others. Reeve told me the other day that the aristocracy had never been stronger in England than they are now ; for that they had never poured out their blood more freely. But I must remark that it is not altogether by military services that an aristocracy can maintain itself ; otherwise ours would not be levelled to the dust, as it actually is, for who ever were more prodigal of their lives than the French gentils-hommes, of all grades, the lesser as well as the greater ? My grandfather and my grand-uncle both met their death on the field of battle ; their father and their grandfather experienced the same fate, and there is hardly a family in the neighbourhood of whom as much cannot be said. Yet there remains not a trace of their power. The last cannon which was mounted on the old baronial château of Tocqueville in my neighbourhood, now half-buried in the earth, serves as a post to tie up cattle, while the château itself is degraded to a farmhouse. I will conduct Reeve thither when he comes to see me ; it will show him what must be the fate of an aristocracy who, though they know how to die, do not know how to govern. Yours has till now done both, and this is the reason why it still holds its ground, although the temper of the age is anything but favourable to its continuance."

' The opinion suggested, rather than expressed, by the writer is, that our aristocracy no longer know how to govern.

' This I do not believe. I believe that our aristocracy know better than they ever did how to govern. I believe that they fully participate in the general progress, and have among their ranks, not only more men, but a greater proportion of men, of diligence, knowledge, and intelligence, than they ever had.

‘Our difficulties seem to me to arise from the unfitness for government, not of our aristocracy, but of our democracy. The Reform Act has thrown into democratic hands a large portion of the power of which it has stripped the aristocracy. By diminishing by more than one-half the aristocratic members of the House of Commons, it has narrowed into less than one-half the field from which we can select aristocratic statesmen. But it has given us none—at least, none of any eminence—and it promises none. The ten-pounders do not elect statesmen, and if one of their members tries, like Hawes, to be useful in office to the country, they turn him out. Thence it is that we are forced to keep turning round and round in the narrow circle of aristocratic statesmen to whom the incapacity of our democratic Members of Parliament confines us. I fear that there is some ground for Nicholas’ prophecy that our bourgeois Parliament would not be able to carry on a war. Not, as he supposed, from its economy, but from its want of administrative talent.

‘G—— tells me that he has refused the secretaryship of the Board of Control, vacated by Lowe. If Layard had been appointed Under-Secretary of War, G—— would have joined the Government. Layard, as might be expected, talks in the same strain. He told me that he was delighted at not being connected with a Government which would have silenced him, discredited him, and at length dragged him down in its fall, for he does not expect its duration. He and G—— both look forward to a Derby administration. Lowe’s retirement from the Board of Control is not a good omen. He has great talents, great ambition, and no scruples. He too says that he would have remained if Layard had been taken in. He has returned to the Times, and wrote a violent democratic article in the paper of the 14th. I hear that he thinks this Ministry shortlived.'

'February 17.—Lady William Russell and Hastings Russell* called on us. Hastings refused the Secretaryship of the Board of Control—he says, because he did not think himself fit for it, and because he wishes to keep his vote unfettered; but I suspect that distrust of the permanence of this Government influenced him. Neither Lady William nor Hastings thinks that it can last. "If the House," he said, "had come to a vote last night, Palmerston would have been in a minority. We shall see what will be done when Roebuck names his committee on Thursday, but at present there is a majority for carrying on the inquiry at any risk."

'Lady William has no hopes of Lord John's success in Vienna, but is anxious to get him out of England. "His family," she says, "are trying to keep him at home, not only because he is now in bed with influenza and not fit for the journey, but also with vague hopes of his return to the Premiership. I have no such expectations," she said, "at least at present, for nothing can equal his London unpopularity. It is perfectly true that he ought to have resigned in November, but he tells me that Lord Lansdowne, Lord Palmerston, and Sir G. Grey all entreated him to remain. Perhaps I have lived too much abroad to enter thoroughly into the English feeling that a man's first duty is to his party, and his second to his country."

* Afterwards Duke of Bedford.

‘My son brought home news from the Chancellor this evening that the Government have resolved, if Roebuck’s motion for naming the committee of inquiry is carried on Thursday, to dissolve.’

‘Wednesday, February 22.—I wrapped myself in furs, and got to the Athenæum. The first person that I saw there was Charles Austin.

‘He is alarmed at the defection of the Peelites—that is, of Gladstone, Graham, Herbert, and Lord Canning—which was announced last night. He fears that it may pave the way to a Derby Government, which must be disastrous, not because they are peculiarly dishonest—all statesmen are dishonest—but from their gross, hopeless ignorance.

“‘You don’t live,” he said, “among country gentlemen; I do. They are very kind, very gentlemanlike; but they know nothing, and they wish to know nothing. They never read; they are afraid to do so, for fear of unsettling their opinions. They look on Adam Smith as the Archbishop of Canterbury does on Strauss: as a book that would disturb their faith. Have you heard how they received Lord Derby at the Conservative meeting yesterday? With hisses and howls, and cries of ‘No Puseyites, no Papists!’ He was forced to beg pardon for having asked for the assistance of Gladstone and Graham, and to promise never to do so again.”

“‘What would you do,” I asked, “to avert a Derbyite reign?”

“‘I would take in Layard and Lowe,” he said. “I would make Lowe Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, if that belongs to Cardwell, President of the Board of Control, or anything else to get him into the Cabinet. His speech to his Kidderminster constituents in to-day's Times is the most statesmanlike thing that I have seen for a long time—wise and temperate. I would send Bright to the Home Office.”

“How could he join,” I said, “a War Cabinet?”

“That is his look-out,” said Austin. “We have no business to know anything about his superstitions. Either he would do well—and then you have a good public servant—or he would be extinguished, as Milner Gibson was, with his poison-fangs drawn. I would take in Cobden, too.”

‘Lord Overstone and Strelecki joined us. Overstone agreed thoroughly with Austin in admiring Lowe’s speech, and in wishing to see him in the Cabinet, and Layard in the Government. He fears that Palmerston is not up to the emergency, that he is encumbered by the traditions of a forty years’ peace, and does not see that such a war as this is not a business of routine.

“People complain,” he said, “that the House of Commons is angry and unmanageable. It ought to represent the feelings of the people; it ought to require that the strength and safety of England is not complimented away to avoid hurting the feelings of a few excellent, amiable, well-conducted, scrupulous, timid incapables.”

“You and Strelecki,” I said, “ought to throw yourselves into the breach. You ought to go to the Home Office, and Strelecki, who has administered in a famine,* should go with MacNiel to the Crimea.”

* The Irish famine in 1848.

“ “Any office,” said Overstone, “for me must be a home office; but before you put me into one you must take twenty years from me, and give me back my eyes and my nerves.”

“ “As for me,” said Strelecki, “I have never refused my services, for they have never been asked for.”

“ “One source of our misfortunes,” said Overstone, “was that we did not believe in the seriousness of the affair. We thought that it would be a mere demonstration to keep the Russians on the north of the Balkan, and that the army would return in six months.”

“ “Such,” said Strelecki, “was Lord Raglan’s own expectation. He told me just before he started that he expected no fighting, and accordingly he took his friends on his staff, to give them a pleasure tour and the chance of promotion.”

“ “I believe,” said Overstone, “that our chief motive for going to the Bosphorus was to prevent the French from being sole masters of Constantinople. We have so managed matters as to have incurred all this calamity and disgrace, and to make them as thoroughly masters there as if we had stayed at home.”

‘ While we were talking, Sir John MacNiel came up to me.

“ “When do you go?” I asked.

“ “To-morrow morning,” he answered, “and I hope to be on the spot in a fortnight.”

“ “I trust,” I said, “that you have full powers?”

“ “When Panmure,” he answered, “telegraphed for me, and told me that he wished me to go to the Crimea, I told him that I never had asked for any office, and never had refused one in which I thought that I could be useful, but that I must know precisely what was expected from me, and what were my powers. I will not tell you what was his answer to my first question, but I will tell you that my powers are sufficient."

"Can you dismiss?" I asked.

"No," he answered; "but I can cause dismissal."

"In what time?"

"In an hour, and I am determined that not one of my powers shall be unemployed. I go fully resolved to show no favour, no affection, no mercy. I know that our people here—and Trevelyan among the rest—have so fettered every department and every proceeding with forms, and delays, and responsibilities, that our Administration is like a man in the collapse of cholera: the circulation is stopped, and the muscles do not act. I heard a characteristic story yesterday. A party of marines were landed at Balaklava; the snow was on the ground; the officer in command applied to the store-keeper for tents; they were furnished. A couple of hours after came down an order from the Quartermaster-General's office threatening the clerks who had furnished them without an order with dismissal, and ordering the tents to be struck. It was done, and the men passed the night in the snow."

"I wish," I said, "that Strelecki went with you."

"So do I," he answered, "and Strelecki would go.

I wanted him, or Oliphant, or John Paget; but they have given a very good man—Tulloch.”

““Of course,” I said, “you might have had whomsoever you wished?”

““I suppose so,” he answered, “but I made no terms whatever.””

‘Saturday, February 24.—I breakfasted this morning with Lord Lansdowne.

““Well,” he said, “I hope that you think that we were right in holding on.”

““I heard,” I said, “last Saturday that you thought of dissolving.”

““What good,” he answered, “would that have done? We know that at the meeting of the Derbyites the first pledge required from Lord Derby was that he would prosecute the inquiry, and he gave it. If we had dissolved, such a pledge would have been exacted at every hustings. The war and the inquiry are the only things that now interest the electors. There is no other subject for them to think about, and if there were, no other subject, unless it were a religious one, would be attended to by minds which are full of the loss of an army, and the failure, at least for the present, of a war. If we had dissolved, there would have been in the new House a still greater majority for the inquiry. If we had resigned, Lord Derby would have been as impotent against it as we are. By staying in, we hope at least to diminish the mischief. By resigning, we certainly should have aggravated it. Roebuck is reasonable, and we shall have a fair and intelligent committee. We shall give them all the reports from the commissioners whom we have sent out, and shall send out, and I hope that they will be satisfied with that. This morning we had a paper from Lord Raglan, containing his defence. I have not had time to see more than the outside. It is voluminous. He tells us that the day before he wrote—that is, a fortnight ago—they had a council of all the generals, and decided unanimously on the next operation. Our army, too, is improving from day to day; the convalescents are rejoining it, not by hundreds, but by thousands. I hear an excellent account,” he added, “of the Piedmontese and of La Marmora.”

“Where are they to go?” I asked. “I hope to Eupatoria. I should be sorry to see them exposed to the disease of Balaklava.”

“It is not decided,” he answered.

“Do you believe,” I said, “in Louis Napoleon’s journey?”

“He has talked the matter over fully,” answered Lord Lansdowne, “with Lord John. He certainly was bent on it, and he will not admit that he has given it up. It seems that there has been much disagreement in the French camp, and he thinks that his presence would compose it. All his Ministers, and all those about him, are strenuously opposed to it, and no one more than Plon-Plon.* He swears that he will not return. Louis Napoleon, however, does not like to leave him.”

“On what terms are they?” I asked.

“There is a fair exterior,” answered Lord Lansdowne, “but I fancy that the Emperor has judged Plon-Plon, and that Plon-Plon knows it. I hear that his Crimean campaign has excited so much disgust and contempt as to put an end to his chances of the succession."

* Prince Napoleon, Jerome’s son.

"I presume," I said, "that there was nothing in the rumour of the legitimization of Morny?"

"There could have been nothing in it," said Lord Lansdowne. "I almost wonder that it attained currency. Lord John's mission," he added, "has given great pleasure in Vienna. They are getting over their prejudices. Haynau is forgotten; and though there is a strong Russian party in the Court, the Emperor is decided. He is not like the poor King of Prussia. His confidence once given, even to a burgher and democrat, is not easily withdrawn. The old dislike of Palmerston is over; but as to his active alliance, I believe that that depends on Sebastopol. He has a good general—perhaps the best in Europe—and a good army, but it is not equal in numbers to the Russian force opposed to it.

"I thought," I said, "that the Austrian army amounted to 460,000 men."

"It may do so, on paper," said Lord Lansdowne; "but, exclusive of the forces in Italy, which must remain there, I do not believe that it amounts to 200,000. The Russians still keep their best troops on the Gallician and Hungarian frontier. The Imperial Guard is there, and I believe their army to be stronger than Hesse's. If we take Sebastopol, a French army may march through Germany to aid them, or may occasion in the South a more important diversion than the Crimean operations do; but I do not expect to see the Austrians move while Sebastopol resists."

“I have sometimes thought,” I said, “that the capture of Sebastopol might retard the peace.”

“Do you suppose,” he answered, “that we should ask higher terms than we do now? I do not think that we ought, and I do not believe that we should.”

“No,” I said; “I do not suppose that after the fall of Sebastopol we should ask for more, but I think it possible that Nicholas would be able to grant less. If he makes peace now, he makes it on equal terms. Each party has had its successes and its calamities, and he has shown that he can resist France and England united. But if we take Sebastopol he makes peace as a beaten man. That would be humiliating to him, and perhaps unsafe. The Russians put me in mind of the Romans, and, like them, may resolve not to terminate a war except at a moment of success: to be multis pugnis, nullo bello, victi. If Nicholas were a man of sense he would hurry on a peace while Sebastopol stands.”

“If he had been a man of sense,” said Lord Lansdowne, “he would not have made the war. Disbelieving in his sense, and believing in his obstinacy, I expect him to go on fighting until he is subdued by want of money and of men.”

“The power of raising men,” I said, “does not seem to depend on the population, or even on the wealth of a country. Prussia, with 15,000,000, has, it seems, almost as large a force as Austria with 37,000,000, and we, with nearly 30,000,000, find it difficult to equal even Prussia.”

“I am beginning,” said Lord Lansdowne “to let go an opinion to which I have clung all my life, that we can continue to rely on volunteers now that the Channel is bridged over by steam and that all Europe is sacrificing domestic improvement, and wealth and comfort, to a rivalry in keeping up large armies. I fear that we must have one so numerous as to require some sort of conscription.

“One thing,” he continued, “has been done of great and, I trust, permanent importance. We are disciplining a Turkish force under English officers: the men delight in it. They prefer infinitely our officers to their own, and if Turkey is to be preserved, such an army seems to give her the only chance of being able to stand alone.

“To return,” he added, “to home affairs. I hope that we shall get a friend of yours—George Lewis—I was very anxious for Lord Grey, but his paix à tout prix is a serious objection, and his military reforms, though wise and energetic, would have been forced on with a disregard of friction and of individual feeling which would have endangered their success. I, who have known him and loved him from a child, can laugh at his ebullitions, and make him laugh at them, but they are bitterly offensive to strangers. A very able friend of mine told me that he never left Lord Grey without thinking whether he ought to call him out. I believe that we are safer with Panmure. He seems to be doing admirably. He is very active, quite cool, and thoroughly decided. Grey has promised his zealous assistance, and I have no doubt will give it.”

“I find,” I said, “a great wish to bring Lowe into the Cabinet.”

“Well,” said Lord Lansdowne, “he certainly is able. Among our difficulties," he added, "is one that I have heard you mention, that the democracy, which takes half our seats, gives us no statesmen. A second, or perhaps a cause of the first, is that the enormous demand for talent and energy in industrial pursuits turns those who might be politicians into engineers and railway contractors. The clever young men in the high aristocracy go naturally to politics, or to what is a branch of politics—to the law; but if a country clergyman has two or three sons, he hopes that the best of them may tread in the steps of Brassey or Peto, rather than in those of our permanent officials.

"It is true that the reformed House sympathizes much better with the people than the old one did, for it represents them better. The old House represented only birth and wealth, and of wealth only the wealth that was invested in land or in money. The great manufacturers or merchants seldom found their way into it. The House, therefore, like its constituents—if patrons could be called constituents—was timid, routinier, and prejudiced and self-interested. We never could have carried Poor Law Amendment, or Municipal Reform, or Tithe Reform, or Irish Church Reform, or Free Trade in the unreformed House. But we probably should have had twice as many men fit for high office, and they would have been younger men, and at the same time men of more experience. They would have been trained in politics, which comparatively few are now. What are called our young men now, such as Lowe and Layard, are men who have made their reputation in literature or law, and have to learn politics as a new pursuit. Even Lewis' reputation is much more speculative than practical. He is a distinguished writer, but has not yet risen to real political distinction."

"What," I said, "will the seceders do?"

"It is impossible," he answered, "to promise more fairly. Sidney Herbert would have stayed in if he could have persuaded the others to do so. At the same time, if there was anyone that ought to withdraw, it was the Secretary at War. He said that he was anxious to show that an ex-Minister can give real support to his former colleagues. So, indeed, said they all; the only subject on which there is a shadow of difference between us is the inquiry; and even on that, as respects its mischief, we are agreed, but we thought it clearly irresistible; they thought that it might be opposed with at least a chance of success."

'Sunday, February 25.—I breakfasted with Van de Weyer.*

"I have been confined," he said, "to my bed for six weeks in the country, and came to town, knowing little of politics, only a few days ago.

"I am alarmed and indignant at the conversation of my colleagues. With the exception of Coloredo, who is a man of sense, they are all exulting over what they think the collapse of the phantom of English power. Even Walewski talks very imprudently of your dependence on France, and of the ease with which you might be conquered. He even hinted to me that your Government ought to be required to interfere against the press, and to prevent its telling stories disadvantageous to the allied armies. I warned him, as he valued the friendship of England, to avoid touching that string. I tried to point out to him that if one's child were ill, one would rather be afflicted by daily bulletins than hear nothing, or nothing but lies. After all, what is the real amount of your failure?

* The Belgian Minister.

“You have lost 30,000 men out of 45,000; the Russians, in their two campaigns, admit officially a loss of 150,000 men, exclusive of that among their sailors and marines, which must amount to 30,000 more. The French admit a loss of 67,000 men. They have sent 157,000, only 90,000 now remain. When last I heard from the Crimea, about a fortnight ago, the French loss, on the previous day, amounted to several thousand men. All Europe was as unprepared for the war as you were—none more so than the Russians. They believed that a mere demonstration would do, and invaded the Principalities with 40,000 men. Their 40,000 men were destroyed or driven out, and that by Turks, in a few months. The French sent their army, a besieging army, without heavy artillery, and so mismanaged their attack that their batteries were silenced in two hours.

“I believe that out of these calamities will come much good—not perhaps equal to the evil, but still positive good. Fortune will pay you a dividend.

“In the first place, it is something that the Queen should have behaved so admirably, and that, having been tried by prosperity, she has now been tried by adversity, and has nobly supported each. Secondly, I cannot but think that you will improve your military education. Your men are the best in the world—your officers are among the worst. You will subject them to examination ; you will abolish purchase ; you will give free room to promotion ; you will not let the army be a profession in which merit and demerit are on a par. And, lastly, I trust that you will see the absolute necessity of letting your army bear a less absurd proportion to your population and your wealth. You would find it far easier to keep up an army of 200,000 men than Russia or Austria or France find it to keep up their armies. It is hard, without doubt, that you should be forced to spend eight or nine millions a year in feeding and clothing and lodging 100,000 men, to march and mount guard, whom you could profitably employ in making railroads or draining your fields ; but it is the price you have to pay for security, and with less than that army, in the present state of the Continent, you are not safe. You should study the arrangements of our camp at Beverloo, near Diest. It is the best military school in the world."

" "Are you still afraid of France ?" I asked.

" "A year ago," he answered, " my fears had subsided ; but they have revived since I came to London and have listened to Continental politicians. Depend on it that unless you regain your military character, unless it is again believed that you are formidable, you will no longer be able to protect us by giving us mere moral support. When you cease to be dreaded, we shall be attacked."

" "Do you believe," I asked, "in the Crimean journey ?"

" "I do not believe," he answered, "that it has been given up. Louis Napoleon's intention to make it has led to some remarkable scenes between him and Plon-Plon. When Plon-Plon returned the Emperor received him very coldly, kept him only a short time, and never alluded to the Crimea. Plon-Plon was furious. He called Emile Girardin to his counsels, and together they concocted a pamphlet on the Crimea, which was sent to Brussels for publication. Common friends interfered and they were reconciled, and Plon-Plon had another audience, in which the Emperor embraced him and shed tears—in short, there was an affecting scene, and the pamphlet was suppressed. Then came Louis Napoleon's journey, and he required Plon-Plon to accompany him, not thinking it safe, probably, to leave him. Plon-Plon refused; they quarrelled, and Plon-Plon sent orders for the publication of his pamphlet. It is out; I have sent for a copy, but it has not yet arrived."

'Van de Weyer then showed me a letter from King Leopold, in which he affirmed that there could be no doubt that the pamphlet was by Napoleon Bonaparte.

"It is said," he added, "that he intends to prosecute the printer; but if the printer tells all that he knows about the author a jury will not readily convict him."

'Mrs. Grote and H—— came to us in the afternoon. Mrs. Grote is violent at Lord John's appointment to the Colonies.

"A fellow," she said, "who from the time he joined Lord Aberdeen was plotting to turn him out, with the shoes not two months old in which he scrambled over the ship's side after he had cut a hole in her bottom, to be thus rewarded for his intrigues and his falsehood! If Grote were not so young a man, if he were seventy instead of sixty, and had attained the proper age for public life, he should stand for the City and beat him. Then his pompous embassy to Vienna! That, I suppose, is to be abandoned to suit the little man's convenience. Then Charles Villiers is to be brought into the Cabinet. I have a great mind to post up a reward for anyone who will give information where he has been, and what he has done, for the last three years."

"His silence was convenable," said H——. "To do little and say nothing, and get into no scrapes, is the peculiar office of a subordinate member of a Government."

"Well," continued Mrs. Grote, "if this rotten, worn-out coach, with not a single new piece of wood in it, except George Lewis, runs through the session, it must find smoother roads and better coachmanship than I expect. When it upsets, you will see the people take the reins, and my fear of such a consummation is much abated. The mischief that the aristocracy have done us during the last six months, and the results which they have heaped on us during the last six weeks, are going far to reconcile me to democracy."

"They ought," I said, "rather to reconcile you to despotism. I see much in the events of the last six months, and of the last six weeks, in favour of the rule of one—nothing in favour of the rule of the many."

"Do not you think," said Mrs. Grote, "that if we were not tied down by the bonds of our aristocratic routine, we could find hundreds of men fit to govern the country? Is it not true that there are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it?"

"Quite true," I answered; "but the bonds which tie us down are not those of aristocratic routine, but of representative institutions. Under such institutions you must choose your statesmen from your representatives, and the ten-pounders will not elect statesmen."

"Do the patrons," she answered, "elect them? Where have the ten-pounders elected more useless members than the three brothers whom we know, nominated by their father, the Earl? The democratic boroughs seem to me always to wish for the best men."

"Then," I said, "they do not know where to find them, for they elect only mediocrities."

"What did you hear," asked Mrs. Grote, "at Van de Weyer's?"

"Van de Weyer," I answered, "hopes that we shall keep up an army of 200,000 men."

"Then," said Mrs. Grote, "I will go to America. Can we no longer trust our fleet?"

"Would our fleet," I said, "have kept Russia out of Constantinople?"

"I believe," answered Mrs. Grote, "that it would. But, after all, it was not our business; it was the business of Austria. We might have trusted to her to keep Russia from the Bosphorus."

"As we could not trust her," I answered, "to keep Russia out of the Principalities, or even to keep open the Danube, I would not have trusted her with anything. In fact, she is too weak, too heterogeneous, and too poor to resist Russia, unless she is backed by the assistance, military as well as naval, of France and England. And even so backed you see that she is afraid to move.”’

‘Monday, February 26.—I breakfasted with E. Ellice, and found him on his wheel-chair, rendered by gout incapable of standing.

““I am sick,” he said, “of what is going on. It is not so much indignation that worries me as contempt. The indecision of these clever Ministers has ruined the peace, has ruined the war, has ruined Palmerston’s first Cabinet, and will ruin his second.

““If they had known what they were about, and what they intended, we should have had no war; or if they had been forced into one, we should have kept our army, or have got Sebastopol. And now with the rump of an administration—their best men gone, and their next-best discredited—they are to fill the double characters of Ministers every day, and prisoners under trial every evening.”

““Their defence,” I said, “is that the inquiry was irresistible.”

““I have no doubt that it was,” he answered, “but they were not bound to submit to it as Ministers. They should have gone out, formed a strong Opposition, and let the Derbyites carry it on at their peril. However, we have got this by it, there will no longer be the troublesome third, Peelite party. We shall come back to Whigs and Tories.”

““We are told,” I said, “that Derby pledged himself not to have recourse again to the Peelites.”

““By no means,” said Ellice; “he has been misrepresented. He spoke very sensibly. ‘When you talk to me,' he said, 'of parties, and of consistency, recollect my own history. In 1831 I was a Radical, in 1842 I was a Tory, and in 1846 I became a Conservative. Why am I not to allow to others the freedom of action and opinion that I take for myself? Why are you not to allow to Gladstone and Graham the latitude which you allow to me?' He refused to pledge himself. Depend on it, notwithstanding their professions, you will see the Peelites absorbed by the Derbyites, and the Radicals by the Whigs, or the Whigs by the Radicals—that is to say, if the people do not rush in, which, unless we make a triumphant peace, or a triumphant war, they will do, sooner or later. It will not be the next change. When these people fall, as fall they will if Sebastopol stands, Derby will come in. He may do better; he may get out of the old routine; but if he does not, if he keeps within the noble circle, you will have a perfectly unmanageable House—unmanageable perhaps from their dispositions, and still more so from their pledges. You will have a raw, violent, Times-and-Daily-News Government, and God knows how it will act."

"How do you expect," I said, "these men to be killed?"

"A coups d'épingles," he answered; "by a succession of petty defeats. The people behind them are indifferent: they will vote for them, but they will attend ill. The people below the gangway think that this Parliament is not good for six months, and vote only as they think it best for the hustings."

"What could have been the motive for the appointment of Seaton?" I asked.

“ I suppose,” he answered, “ intimacy with Hardinge. Hardinge, like the rest of us, does not see that his coevals get old.”

“ Would you have kept Hardinge ?” I asked.

“ Of course I would not,” he answered, “ nor any of them. Before I took the Secretaryship of War in 1830 I had a committee on the army. One of our unanimous recommendations was that all the higher posts in the administration of the army should be held, at longest, for only five years. That is almost a quarter of a century ago. In no one point has our recommendation been attended to. If it had been followed we should now have five times as many men with a general knowledge of the army as we have now. Now, if a man displeases his irremovable chief, he is forgotten, or remembered to no good. If there had been a rotation, he would have had his appeal to the successor.

“ Then for the Cabinet appointments there are men in the Commons better than many whom they have taken, or at least as good, with the advantage of not being nobles. There are Collier* and Lowe. I would have offered the Colonies to Lord Stanley, Derby’s son. I would have brought in Charles Villiers.”

“ Would you have taken in Lord John ?” I said.

“ He is a strange being,” said Ellice, “ but I think that it was only by taking him in that he could be kept straight. He is utterly ignorant of men ; he takes no advice ; he acts upon impulse, but he is as honest a little fellow as ever breathed.

“ When he joined the coalition everyone believed that in a year or two, by the time the new party was consolidated, he would succeed in the course of nature to the premiership. Then came his absurd Reform Bill, which disgusted everybody, and his quarrel with Palmerston, which hit the coalition hard.* When the war came he wished Newcastle to keep both offices. Newcastle said that he could do the work, and Johnny believed him. Johnny believed, too, when he went away to Scotland in the autumn, that all was going on well. He came back, read the Times, and got frightened, tried to get rid of Newcastle, and was overruled. He acquiesced, remained in the Government sulky, but with no plans of quitting it, still less of destroying it, till Roebuck's motion was coming on. Then he sat down by his fireside in the evening, thought over his speech in answer, found that it would not do, and without consulting his friends, or even his followers, wrote his letter of resignation. The night of the debate he came to me, and asked me how I should vote.

* Afterwards Lord Monkswell.

“ ‘How shall I vote?’ I answered. ‘Do you suppose that I shall vote against my friends, and for a mischievous thing?’ ”

“ ‘In what spirits,’ I asked, ‘is Palmerston?’ ”

“ ‘Not good,’ he answered; ‘he is too old for his work. He spent a couple of hours with me yesterday. I advised him to make more use of his subordinates. ‘Don't answer Dizzy,’ I said, ‘yourself. Leave that to Cockburn, Keogh, and Bernal Osborne. Set them to work on Hansard. Let them prepare themselves whenever Dizzy speaks—and he seldom speaks without one's being able to foresee it—to search out his antecedents, and trust them for covering him with mud.'

* For Lord John's conduct see Spencer Walpole's 'Life of Lord Russell,' vol. ii., pp. 176-269.

“I have had a long letter,” he continued, “from the Prince*—clever, like everything of his, but impracticable. He wants a large standing army, which no British Parliament will keep up in time of peace; he wants military schools, and examinations, and competition. Now I think that we have military schools enough, and though I am anxious for examinations, I do not wish for competition, except for the staff. A very little knowledge is all that you need from a regimental officer. Macdonald, who defended Hougoumont, who was one of the best men ever seen in the field, could scarcely read. I would require every man who came for a commission to pass, and would give them a little more to do for each step, and I would let them get their knowledge where they could. For the staff I would have professors and competition, and only the successful candidates should be eligible. The same sort of minimum standard I would apply to the civil service, not Trevelyan's senseless concours. The only papers worth reading in that Blue-book are Stephen's and Waddington's. As for having the bulk of our officers composed of any but gentlemen, it is nonsense. There may be some bad regiments, where there has been an incapable colonel, but in general the feeling between the officers and the men is perfect. The men are ready to die, or even—what is much more—starve for their officers. They would not feel so towards their old companions who had risen above them.

* The Prince Consort.

“I hope,” he added, “that my gout may relieve me from serving on this committee; but if I am forced into it, I must do my duty.

“The first questions that I shall ask the Duke of Newcastle will be :

“‘Had you any definite plans when you sent the troops to Malta?

“‘Had you any definite plans when you sent them to Varna?

“‘When did you determine on the attack of Sebastopol?

“‘What did you believe to be the Russian force then in the Crimea?

“‘What did you believe to be the force necessary to attack the town?

“‘What provision had you made for keeping up the strength of our army, and how soon could the necessary reinforcements reach it?

“I believe that the answers to these few questions will show that the war has been conducted with a want, not merely of foresight, but of inquiry, which would disgrace a Turk. The Duke seems to have reasoned Orientially. ‘If it be the will of Allah that we take Sebastopol, we shall take it, whatever be its strength, with 50,000 men, without cavalry, siege artillery, or reinforcements. If it be the will of Allah that we do not take it, the more men and material that we send the greater will be our loss.’”

‘I received a letter in the evening from Lady Theresa, announcing Lewis’ acceptance of the Chancellorship of the Exchequer. Her pleasure at his being in the Cabinet is mixed with anxiety as to his success in an office in which few have retained their reputation, and fewer their popularity ; in which so much harm must be done, and so much good must be rejected. I think, however, Lewis eminently fitted for it. He has great knowledge, diligence, and intelligence. He is not bold. He would not have undertaken the succession duty, or the extension of the income-tax, nor does he possess the wonderful fertility of argument, illustration, and resource that enabled Gladstone to carry them, but he will thoroughly understand the system which he finds established ; he will see clearly and judge calmly the different mischiefs produced by every tax ; he will apply to finance, to political economy, and to general politics a profound knowledge of the principles of legislation. Other members of the Cabinet may know more of the art of government, but not one has gone so deeply into its theory.'

'Calais, Tuesday, February 27.—I left London this morning.

'When I began this journal, a month ago, I saw that we were at the beginning of a long struggle, the result of which might influence for some years the state of parties and the progress of events ; and I thought that I might be able to preserve some facts, or, at least, some opinions, which may be interesting twenty years hence.

'I did not foresee that I should be imprisoned more or less strictly during nearly the whole period by bronchitis, nor that my little grandson should be attacked by scarlatina, and consequently that I should be able to see few people out of my house, and that few, especially those with young children, would choose to enter it.

‘These accidents have confined me to so narrow a circle that my journal is meagre as a collection of facts, and monotonous as a picture of opinions.

‘I am glad, however, that I have kept it. My interlocutors are few, and they often repeat themselves, but they are, in general, men of great experience and intelligence.

‘NASSAU W. SENIOR.’

CHAPTER IX.

JOURNAL IN 1855 (continued): JOURNAL IN 1856.

MR. SENIOR spent the four months after he left London in Paris and Algiers. In Paris, as in London, nothing was talked of except the war. The Emperor Nicholas died on March 2, but still the war continued. Lord John Russell went on a mission to Vienna, to meet the Plenipotentiaries for France, Austria, Russia and Turkey, to negotiate a peace, but was not successful.

'Kensington, Saturday, July 7, 1855.—I left England at the end of February, just after a Ministerial crisis, and it seems that I have returned to a new one.

Ever since Lord John Russell's return from Vienna there have been rumours of a difference of opinion in the Cabinet respecting the war, and it has been said that he heads the party which believes that the Austrian propositions* ought to have been accepted, and, if they could be renewed, ought to be accepted now.

* These famous points, as they were originally framed, were, shortly, as follows: (1) The protectorate which Russia had hitherto exercised over the Principalities was to be replaced by a collective guarantee. (2) The navigation of the mouths of the Danube was to be freed from all impediments. (3) The Treaty of 1841 was to be revised in the interests of the European equilibrium. (4) Russia

‘A warlike speech by Lord John, a few weeks ago, checked, but did not extinguish, these rumours. Yesterday, Milner Gibson formally asked Lord John if there was any foundation for them. Lord John replied that there was ; that when the Austrian propositions were communicated to him, he believed that they afforded a basis for a fair peace—that he believed so now. That he regretted their rejection, but continued a member of the Cabinet because he agreed with his colleagues on all other points, and did not think it right to endanger the Government by leaving them. To which Disraeli answered that, far as the practice of open questions had extended, he never before heard of a Cabinet in which peace or war had been left open.

‘I met to-day the Duke of Argyll.

“You must have been astonished,” he said, “at Lord John’s speech yesterday ; but you could not have been more so than we were. It revealed to us, for the was to renounce all official protectorate over the Sultan’s subjects, of whatever religion. In the latter half of November, 1854, the Czar, in consequence of Prussian advice, offered to accept these four points as the basis of peace. The offer induced the allies to define their meaning more exactly. In particular, they declared that the revision of the Treaty of 1841, under the third point, involved the termination of Russian preponderance in the Black Sea. This declaration did not induce Russia to recede from the negotiation. On the contrary, though the meaning of the allies was distinctly pointed out in a memorandum prepared by Baron Bourqueney, the French Minister at Vienna, and handed to Prince Gortchakoff, the formal offer to treat was renewed. . . . Lord John was instructed to get Baron Bourqueney’s memorandum embodied in a protocol, and signed by all the Plenipotentiaries. This preliminary object secure, Lord John was instructed to take the four points in their natural order.’—(From Walpole’s ‘Life of Lord Russell,’ vol. ii., pp. 248, 249.)

first time, that we had the honour of possessing among us the head of the peace party.”

‘Sunday, July 8.—I breakfasted with Hayter.

‘He thinks the event of yesterday a very grave one. “Lord John,” he said, “cannot remain in the Cabinet. He may tell us that now that this chance of peace has been thrown away, he is as eager in the prosecution of the war as any of his colleagues can be; but the public will not believe him, and even those who do will distrust his firmness. Nor can the Cabinet ever feel safe with such a colleague, who never tells them what he is going to do, and from rashness, or from carelessness, or from ignorance, is always springing mines under them. I have seen much of prime ministers, and I never had to do with anyone with whom it was so satisfactory to act as with Palmerston, or so unsatisfactory as Lord John. Palmerston is frank, and open, and confiding, listens to everything, considers everything, tells you his whole plans, and keeps to them. Lord John was always reserved and suspicious, even with me, his own Secretary of the Treasury; never explained fully what he wanted or what he intended, and never adhered to what he did propose. His long Parliamentary experience has given him great dexterity in getting out of scrapes, and his great knowledge of Parliamentary history enables him always to cite a precedent, but as a statesman he seems to deteriorate every session.”

‘After leaving Hayter, I walked for some time with Lord Monteagle.

“Did his colleagues,” he said, “know what Johnny intended to say?”

“Certainly not,” I answered.

“Then,” he replied, “I can compare him only to the machine which we are finding in the Baltic, and to which we give the appropriate name of ‘infernal.’”

“As I was walking home, I met George Lewis. He turned back with me, and we walked for about an hour in the Park.

“Lord John’s speech,” he said to me, “is incomprehensible.* As far as I, as a member of the Cabinet, know, the Austrian propositions were never rejected by us, for they never were practically offered to us. Lord John had nothing in writing. But he related to us conversations with Drouyn de Lhuys, Buol, and the Emperor Francis, in which a scheme for maintaining an equilibrium in the Black Sea without requiring Russia to limit her forces there, was shadowed out. He believed this scheme to be the invention of Drouyn de Lhuys, who, having always promised to Louis Napoleon Austrian co-operation, was unwilling to give it up. Lord John therefore thought that the assent of France might be reckoned on; he believed that Austria would join us, if Russia rejected these terms, and he believed, therefore, that Russia, under that pressure, would accept them. And I own that, assuming his premises, I thought that our acceptance of these terms offered a reasonable ground of peace. Russia has had such a lesson that she will not make another attack on Turkey during our time, and before she does she may fall to pieces, or Turkey may fall to pieces, or America may be the greatest political power in the world, and may impose peace on everybody; in short, we shall have different dangers and different means of avoiding them.

* See page 212.

“But while we were discussing the question, it fell through. It first appeared that Louis Napoleon would not accept the Austrian propositions; we next ascertained that Austria would not enforce them, and lastly, that Russia, knowing this, would reject them. While we were manipulating the matter, it disappeared under our hands. What Lord John meant by saying that the Austrian propositions were refused by us, and ought to have been accepted, I cannot conceive. The question of accepting or rejecting them was never put to us.”

“Will Lord John,” I said, “resign?”

“I do not see how he can,” answered Lewis. “He cannot venture to risk breaking up another Government.”

“Has Palmerston,” I said, “become stronger or weaker since I have been out of England?”

“He has shown,” said Lewis, “great diligence and great skill in all respects but one. He has made enemies. The peace party—the Cobden and Bright school—are bitterly hostile to him; that, perhaps, he could not avoid. But so are the ultra-war party, Roebuck and Layard, and so are the Peelites. Out of four sections of the Liberal Party, three detest him.”

‘I dined at Holland House. I mentioned Lewis’ version.

“It is true,” said Lord Holland, “that the Austrian propositions never came practically before the whole Cabinet. But they did come before the interior Cabinet, consisting of Lansdowne, Clarendon, and Palmerston, and were rejected by it. Lewis is also mistaken in thinking that they fell through in consequence of their rejection by Louis Napoleon. Louis Napoleon wished to accept them, and his rejection was obtained through a threat by Palmerston to resign if Louis Napoleon persisted.”

‘Monday, July 9.—I breakfasted with Edward Ellice. Ellice does not venture to prophesy, except that Lord John cannot remain, and yet does not see how he can resign. If he goes, several others belonging to the peace party must go too. On the whole, he thinks a Palmerston-Derby administration a probable solution.

‘I afterwards called on Lord Aberdeen.

“‘Lord John’s colleagues,” he said, “must have been astonished by his speech. I was not, for I knew what he intended to say.”

“‘Do you believe,” I said, “that the Austrian propositions were approved by Louis Napoleon?”

“‘I know,” he answered, “that they were. When we—that is, Clarendon, Lansdowne, and Palmerston—heard this, we wrote to ask him if his approbation was founded on his inability to continue the war, or on his belief that the propositions really secured the independence of Turkey.

“‘‘In the former case,’ we said, ‘we shall accept, too, for we shall not carry on the war alone, but we must tell the whole story. In the latter case, we wish the question to be fully discussed, as our opinions differ from yours.’

“‘He consulted Vaillant,* who told him that, in the

* In 1861 Lord Cowley gave Mr. Senior a description of what took place in Paris:

‘April 13.—While Drouyn de Lhuys,’ said Lord Cowley, ‘was in present state of feeling in the army, a success was necessary to him, and therefore he resolved, at all Vienna, I saw Louis Napoleon every day. He was at that time anxious for peace.

“I do not know,” he said, “what is thought of the English Generals, but ours seem to me to know little of European war, and this double command is fatal. Why cannot the English take the command of the united fleet, and we of the united army? Let their contingent to the army be one-fifth, and let us supply one-fifth of the naval force.”

“I see,” I answered, “only one difficulty. The General who commands the English contingent and all under him will obey implicitly every order of the French Commander-in-Chief. But not a captain of a French gunboat will obey the English Admiral.”

‘It was, I think, on a Sunday that I heard that Drouyn de Lhuys and Lord John had arranged a peace, and the Emperor sent for me on Tuesday. He was walking and smoking in the garden, and he asked me to walk up and down and talk the matter over.

“I think,” he said, “that it is a good arrangement. What think you?”

“Well,” I said, “it does not appear to me that the Russian preponderance in the Black Sea will be materially affected.”

“Not,” he replied, “by our having now a right to keep an equal force there?”

“She is to keep Sebastopol,” I answered. “Her fleet will be at home, and will always be there. France and England will be tired of keeping large fleets, far from all their resources, in a dangerous sea. In a year or two Russia will be as much mistress of the Black Sea and as dangerous to Constantinople as she was when we went to war in 1854.”

“I will talk the matter over again with Drouyn de Lhuys,” he answered.

‘I said, from a sudden impulse which I am not sure I was right in following :

“Would there be any objection to my being present?”

‘He looked a little surprised, and then said, “Certainly not,” and he appointed an hour for the next day.

‘When I arrived, Vaillant was in the antechamber, and Drouyn de Lhuys with the Emperer.

hazards, to reject the propositions. He sent for Cowley and Drouyn de Lhuys, and, I believe, for Vaillant, and made Drouyn de Lhuys explain to him fully the whole matter. When Drouyn de Lhuys had finished, Louis Napoleon said that he had been deceived, that Drouyn de Lhuys' first version of the Austrian propositions differed materially from his present one, and that he wondered that, being such as they really were, they should have been thought

“The game is up,” I thought; “Drouyn de Lhuys has gained the Emperor's ear.”

‘We were soon introduced. The Emperor begged Drouyn de Lhuys to explain the grounds of his arrangement.

‘Drouyn de Lhuys did so at considerable length. I think that he talked for half an hour. The Emperor seemed to go along with him, and when he had finished, said to me :

“Are you not satisfied?”

“My only answer,” I said, “is to beg your Majesty to ask Marshal Vaillant whether he thinks that this arrangement will really effect the purpose of the war—the putting an end to the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea and the Bosphorus.”

‘The Emperor turned to Vaillant.

“I am not a politician,” said Vaillant, “but I know the feelings of the army. I am sure that if, after having spent months in the siege of Sebastopol, we return unsuccessful, the army will not be satisfied.”

‘The Emperor then turned to Drouyn de Lhuys and said :

“Write to Vienna to break off the negotiation.”

‘The next time that I saw the Emperor he showed me letters of Drouyn de Lhuys, written on the very evening of the conference, tendering his resignation; an answer by himself, begging him to reconsider his determination; and a reply from Drouyn de Lhuys, somewhat dry, repeating his resignation.’

‘Then you and Vaillant,’ said Mr. Senior, ‘were the real causes of the continuance of the war?’

‘All turned,’ replied Lord Cowley, ‘upon Vaillant's presence. Louis Napoleon was pleased with the peace, and would have adhered to it if Vaillant had not frightened him.’ (See ‘Conversations with Distinguished Persons.’ Hurst and Blackett, 1880.

worthy of consideration. Whereupon Drouyn de Lhuys resigned.

“It is a frightful thing,” continued Lord Aberdeen, “to think that we are fighting, not for a practical object, but for a succès. A succès was probably as necessary to Alexander as it is to Louis Napoleon. In this case we seem to have become entangled in a mortal duel. Each party is resolved to triumph over the other, and for that purpose each must make up its mind to fight until it succeeds, or is too exhausted to continue.”

‘Lady William Russell called on us, and told us that she dined with Lord John on Saturday, and that he was in the highest spirits.

Wednesday, July 11.—I breakfasted with Van de Weyer, and met Edward Ellice and Rémusat. I walked home with Rémusat, and told him Lord Aberdeen’s story.

“I doubt,” he said, “whether Vaillant acted the part that is ascribed to him. Like almost all the ministers of Napoleon, he is opposed to the war. I think it probable that he supported the Austrian propositions. But I believe the rest of the story to be true. It is certain that Louis Napoleon was at first favourable to them, that he changed his mind, that the conference between him and Cowley and Drouyn de Lhuys took place, and that it occasioned Drouyn de Lhuys’ resignation. I believe, too, that his motive is the desire to wipe off the stain with which our arms have been tarnished by our ill-success before Sebastopol. Your feelings are probably the same. If the Russians feel so too, where is this to end?”

'Friday, July 13.—I breakfasted with Lord Lansdowne, and met Rémusat, Van de Weyer, M. Barron, Sir David Dundas, and one or two others.

'We were too numerous for much political conversation.

"You will find," said Dundas to me as we were going, "that Lord John's speech yesterday has set everything right. He has shown that his speech of last week was misunderstood."

'Great admiration was expressed for the despatches of Lord Clarendon, contained in the papers just published relating to the Austrian propositions. Everyone—Van de Weyer, the homme du métier among the rest—praised their moral as well as their intellectual excellence, their frankness and courage, as well as their skill.

'Saturday, July 14.—Lord John resigned on Wednesday, though, in consequence of the Queen's acceptance of the resignation not having been obtained till yesterday morning, it was not known until the evening.

'I rode in the Park with Delane, the editor of the Times.

"Do you know," he asked, "how Lord John's resignation was obtained?"

"No," I said, "it did not seem a difficult matter."

"It was made so," said Delane, "by the absurd civility of his colleagues. He told them on Wednesday that he felt that, after what had passed, his presence would be a source of weakness, and that he ought to leave them. They turned complimentary, begged him to think better of it, and said that they had no doubt that they could pull him through, etc.

“ To their dismay he replied that if they thought so, he was willing to stay. The next day, however, they were relieved by their subordinates. Several persons holding offices out of the Cabinet represented to Lord John that if he remained they could not vote against Bulwer’s motion of censure. This was, of course, irresistible, and he resigned.”

‘ I dined with Bernal Osborne, and met Sir Charles Wood,* now again First Lord of the Admiralty.

‘ We talked of Lord John’s speech of the 6th.

“ If it surprised the public,” he said, “ who did not know what he intended to say, it surprised infinitely more his colleagues, who thought that they did know : you heard merely what you did not expect. We heard the reverse of what we had a right to expect.”

‘ We talked of the superiority of our naval over our military officers.

“ I attribute it,” said Wood, “ in a great measure to our practice of paying off a ship every three or four years. There are many objections to this. It sometimes disperses a crew which has served together and has formed an esprit de corps. But it enables us to select in every rank the best men for employment, by enabling us to keep unemployed all others. If a regiment is ill-officered, there is generally no help for it. You cannot remove a colonel or a major, or even an ensign, without at least a court of inquiry, and clear delinquency. In the navy, when a ship has been paid off, no officer has a claim to more than his half-pay. He is removed simply by not being employed. We have reports which make us acquainted with the character—moral and intellectual—of every man in the service, and it is our duty, when a ship is commissioned, to place in her the best men that are disposable.

* Afterwards Lord Halifax.

“If there were in the army no regimental rank or precedence; if the seniority of every officer depended merely on the date of his commission; if every regiment were recast every three or four years, and every officer were selected for his merit, or, at least, with reference to his merit, the system in the army would be what the system in the navy is.”

Wood complained of the labour thrown on the Government by requiring them to be legislators as well as administrators.

“When I was first in Parliament,” he said, ‘twenty-seven years ago, the functions of the Government were chiefly executive. Changes in our laws were proposed by independent members and carried, not as party questions, by the combined action of both sides of the House. Now, when an independent member brings forward a subject, it is not to propose himself a measure, but to call to it the attention of the Government. All the House joins in declaring that the present state of the law is abominable, and in requiring the Government to provide a remedy. As soon as the Government has obeyed, and proposed one, they all oppose it. Our defeats as legislators, which is not our business, damage us as administrators, which is our business, and, of course, they are much more frequent. In administration there are seldom more than one, or at most two, alternatives. We had only to accept or to refuse the Austrian propositions. We had at least an even chance of being right. But in legislation there may be twenty or thirty alternatives. The chances are against the precise plan on which the Ministry has staked its credit beating the whole field.”’

‘Sunday, July 15.—I took a long ride with Lord Lansdowne.

“Well,” he said, “what do you think of the events of the week?”

“I think,” I said, “that you are relieved of a colleague with whom you never could feel safe.”

“It is remarkable,” he answered, “that Lord John’s prudence seems to diminish as his age advances. Every year one can less tell on one day what he intends to do the next. Perhaps we were wrong in exposing him to a diplomatic contest to which he was unaccustomed, and against such trained antagonists. I warned him, before he went, against the atmosphere of Vienna. He obviously was not only over-reached, but for a time perverted by the arts of Drouyn de Lhuys, Buol, and the Emperor Francis. But in justice to him I must say that, from the time that it was ascertained that the Austrian propositions would be rejected by France, no one urged more earnestly the vigorous prosecution of the war. His war speech was perfectly sincere.”

“‘But when,’ I said, “was Louis Napoleon’s rejection ascertained? I am told that he was at first favourable, and rejected only in obedience to our remonstrances.”

“That is not true,” said Lord Lansdowne. “He rejected the Austrian propositions before he knew, at least from us, how we intended to deal with them. As they were not submitted to the Conference in writing, it was easy to misrepresent them, and I believe that Drouyn de Lhuys, who was most anxious to illustrate his mission by a peace, actually did misrepresent them. But the effect on Louis Napoleon's mind was dispelled in twenty-four hours."

"Do we know this," I asked, "from any official communications?"

"No," he answered, "we know it merely through the channels to which we generally trust for information."

"I am told," I said, "that his eyes were opened by Vaillant."

"That is true," said Lord Lansdowne, "and the story of the meeting at which Vaillant, Drouyn de Lhuys, and Lord Cowley were present is true; but it is not true that that was a farce. Louis Napoleon acted in the whole matter ably and frankly. He was at first deceived by Drouyn de Lhuys' misrepresentation, but the instant that he understood clearly the nature of what was proposed, he denounced its mischievous absurdity, and is as eager as ever in the prosecution of the war. In fact," he added, "the deliberations of the Cabinet with respect to the Austrian propositions were not deliberations as to the desirableness of their being accepted or rejected, but as to the conduct which we ought to pursue in the event of their being accepted by Louis Napoleon, and before we had come to any decision, we were relieved by hearing that he had rejected them."

'In the course of our ride we called at Lord John's door, and Lord Lansdowne left a letter.

"I have written to him," he said, "to say that, if he wishes to give me any further explanations, I am quite ready to hear them."

'These few words seemed to me to mean or to imply much.

'We talked of Gladstone.

"It is wonderful," he said, "how imagination, and invention, and courage, and knowledge, and diligence—all the qualities that seem to make an orator, and even a statesman—may be neutralized by the want of a sound, over-ruling judgment. Gladstone's faculties are like an army without a general, or a jury without a judge. They are always at variance. Sometimes one gets the better, sometimes another, and the feeling that rules for the time carries him away.

"I am astonished when I reflect how little is the practical loss which we feel in the absence from our councils of two or three of the acutest and brightest intellects in England. Want of judgment, or, as it is often called, 'crotchetyness,' rendered them all frequently useless, and sometimes mischievous."

'Tuesday, July 17.—Van de Weyer, Minghetti, Barron, the Rémusat and Milnes breakfasted with us.

"The history," said Van de Weyer, "of the Vienna negotiations is this :

"Our negotiators were resolved to obtain the cooperation of Austria. Austria was resolved not to give it. Therefore, as we advanced towards what we supposed to be the terms on which she would join us, she receded, and as she receded we advanced. First, we were to take the Crimea from Russia. Austria objected to our requiring a cession of territory. Then Sebastopol was to be destroyed ; Austria would not support such a requisition. Then the Black Sea was to be made neutral ; Austria refused her support.

“ Then the Russian fleet was to be limited ; Austria did not think fifteen sailing-ships too many, and would not fight about numbers. At last Austria proposes the system of counterpoise, which the allies had already refused. And when there seems to be a danger of your Government accepting it, she admits that she would not go to war if Russia should reject it.”

“ You have fitted a key,” I said, “ to the Austrian policy ; can you give us one to Lord John’s ?”

“ I think,” he answered, “ that I can. I believe that he never can get rid of the illusion that he is Prime Minister, if not in the present tense, at least in the paulo-post future. At the Conference he turned himself from an agent into a principal, wished to propose, and afterwards approved, terms, not only unauthorized by his instructions, but absolutely opposed to them, and required to be heard in support of them.”

‘ We returned to the question whether the rejection of the Austrian propositions began with England or with France. I repeated Lord Lansdowne’s statement that Louis Napoleon’s indecision did not last twenty-four hours, that it never was officially known to us, and that it was the knowledge that he had already refused which put an end to our discussions.

‘ Rémusat said that his information came from Thouvenel. That Thouvenel informed him that Louis Napoleon remained favourable to the propositions until he knew that we disapproved them—in short, that he followed us, not we him.

“ Perhaps,” I said, “ he knew, unofficially, that the English Cabinet, or at least the great majority of the Cabinet, disapproved the propositions, and, foreseeing that he would probably have to refuse them, thought it advisable to be the first to do so.”

‘ This was admitted to be a plausible solution.’

‘ Sunday, July 22.—I had a long walk with George Lewis ; we talked over Lord John, Graham, and Gladstone.

‘ Lewis, who has lived much with Lord John for many years, and is indeed connected with him by marriage, to a certain degree takes the same view of his character as Van de Weyer. He, too, thinks that Lord John cannot submit to a secondary part.

“ When he went to Vienna, he went as a diplomatic agent, virtute officii, under control ; but on his road he was overtaken by a despatch begging him to enter the Cabinet. This raised, or rather restored, his sense of importance, which had been a little impaired by his expulsion from the Aberdeen Cabinet and his failure in constructing another one. He thought that, in his double capacity of Plenipotentiary and Cabinet Minister, he should be in some measure master of the negotiations. He found that he was not. He found that all that he did was exposed to the criticism and required the confirmation of Palmerston and Clarendon, and he winced under the infliction of telegraphic messages as much as Pelissier. He saw that if he obeyed his instructions he should probably return unsuccessful, and he resolved, or was persuaded, in concert with Drouyn de Lhuys, to strike out a path for himself en dehors of his instructions. When he came home and found that his ‘conduct’ was disapproved, he became angry and dissatisfied, and said in his speech more than he intended.

“I think,” he continued, “Graham an abler man, but more selfish. He does not, like Lord John, act from impulse, but from calculation. He has separated from this Government because he thinks it short-lived; he believes that it will be succeeded by the Derbyites, and that they will be short-lived, too, and that then a new combination would follow, in which he might be the important element. His object, therefore, is to turn out the present Government as quickly as possible. As to Gladstone,” he added, “I believe him to be honest. He was originally opposed to the war; but he was carried away by the influence of the majority in the Cabinet, an influence which it is very difficult to resist. Now that he has escaped from that influence his old feelings return. He does not choose to admit, even to himself, that he was wrong in consenting to the war; but his old feeling of dislike to it recurs and increases. His whole soul is intent on discovering the means of getting out of it. This was his state of mind when the Vienna proposals arrived. He naturally caught at them: he is furious at their rejection. That rejection deprives him of an opportunity of atoning for the war by taking part in the peace. And the result is, that his declamations against the continuance of the war contain by implication, and sometimes indeed directly, regrets that it was ever undertaken. This the public cannot understand. Perhaps in all our history it never was so warlike. The stupid, violent peace party, who live in a little clique, and know nothing of what is going on, have goaded it into madness by their silly Russianism. They have been the most effectual inflamers of our natural pugnacity. They cannot believe that Gladstone was honest when he supported the war as a Cabinet Minister, and is honest now when he condemns it, being out of office. They ascribe to faction, or ambition, or vanity, conduct which I believe to be the result of a conscientious, scrupulous, ingenuous, undecided mind, always looking to each side of a question, and magnifying the objections which belong to almost every course of action."

"Do you know anything more," I said, "of the secret history of the rejection of the Austrian proposals?"

"I am inclined to think," he answered, "that they were substantially rejected by Palmerston—that is, that if he had chosen, they would have been accepted. I am inclined to think that Napoleon was hesitating when he heard from Walewski that Palmerston disapproved of them, and that he then endeavoured to take the initiative in their rejection."

The news of the fall of Sebastopol reached England on September 10, 1855, but the Treaty of Peace was not signed until March 30, 1856. In the following September Mr. Senior visited Lord Aberdeen. Lord Palmerston continued to be Prime Minister until 1858.

'BUCHANNESS, ABERDEENSHIRE,

'Monday, September 8, 1856.

'I have been spending some days at Haddo, with Lord Aberdeen. There are several persons in the house, and the conversation has been general, and contained little capable of being recorded.

‘To-day Lord Aberdeen drove me over to his villa, perched here on a promontory of red granite, forming the extreme eastern point of Scotland, twenty miles from Haddo. We talked of Pitt, who was Lord Aberdeen’s guardian, and, indeed, brought him up. Lord Aberdeen described his manner as charming. “Nothing,” he said, “could be more easy or playful.”

“Wilberforce,” I said, “whom I knew quite at the end of his life, denied that Pitt possessed the knowledge that was attributed to him. We none of us,” he said, “knew much. We were thrown too early into public life.”

“I do not think,” said Lord Aberdeen, “that Pitt saw very much of Wilberforce during his later years. He complained that Wilberforce had conscientious scruples whenever popularity was to be gained by deserting him, and supported him only when that support was unnecessary.”

“You describe Pitt,” I said, “as playful, yet there is no playfulness in his speeches.”

“No,” said Lord Aberdeen. “Sarcasm and irony are their nearest approach to levity. If he had spoken now, he would have somewhat softened and lowered their lofty and dictatorial tone. The present House would scarcely have tolerated him, when, after the altercation which produced his duel with Tierney, he replied to the Speaker’s address: ‘The House waits for an explanation from the Right Honourable Gentleman’—‘The House will have to wait very long.’ The pride, I may almost say, the arrogance, of his manner, was, perhaps, partly an unconscious imitation of his father, the most insolent speaker who ever ruled a deliberative assembly ; but his astonishing early success, and his prestige, as the son of our greatest orator and our most triumphant Minister, naturally produced his proud tone and excused it."

"Was he a bold man?" I asked.

"Eminently so," answered Lord Aberdeen, "physically and morally. He had one great advantage over Peel. He was sanguine. Peel was brave. He feared no personal danger, and he was ready to meet any moral danger, as he showed on two memorable occasions, but he was not hopeful. His imagination was ever μαντις κακων. He was easily alarmed and discouraged, and always estimated his chances at their worst."

"His great defect," I said, "seemed to me to be his shortsightedness. It is difficult to suppose that when he denounced Catholic Emancipation in 1828 he foresaw that he should have to introduce it in 1829 ; or that when in 1842 he refused to accept an eight-shilling duty on corn, he thought it possible that in 1846 he should have to propose a nominal one."

"It may be difficult," answered Lord Aberdeen, "but I do believe it. I believe that in 1828, and long before 1828, he foresaw that Catholic Emancipation must be granted, and he said to me, after making his Protectionist speech in 1842, that it was the last time that he would speak against Free Trade."

"You are defending," I said, "his intelligence at the expense of his honesty."

"A Prime Minister," replied Lord Aberdeen, "is not a free agent. To break up a Government, to renounce all the good that you hoped to do and leave imperfect all the good that you have done, to hand over power to persons whose objects or whose measures you disapprove, even merely to alienate and politically to injure your friends, is no slight matter.

“All this, however, Peel was willing to do as soon as it appeared to him to be absolutely necessary. His fault was not that he refused to make the sacrifice, but that he delayed it to the last moment.

“His conduct in 1846 was very noble. With the exception of Graham and myself, his whole Cabinet was against him. Lyndhurst, Goulburn, and Stanley were almost violent in their resistance. Still more opposed to him, if it was possible, was the Duke of Wellington. To break up the Cabinet was an act of great courage. To resume office when Lord John had failed in constructing one, was still more courageous. He said to the Queen: ‘I am ready to kiss hands as your Minister to-night. I believe that I can collect a Ministry which will last long enough to carry Free Trade, and I am ready to make the attempt.’ When he said this there were only two men on whom he could rely. One of the first who joined him was Wellington. ‘The Queen’s Government,’ he said, ‘must be carried on. We have done all that we could do for the landed interest. Now we must do all that we can for the Queen.’”

“I have often heard it remarked,” I said, “among others by King Leopold, that Peel ought to have treated his party with more consideration; that he ought to have softened their fall; that he ought to have tried gradually to bring them over, instead of ordering them arbitrarily to vote white when he had always before ordered them to vote black."

"So have I," said Lord Aberdeen. "Brougham wrote to me a letter in that sense which I gave to Peel to answer, and he did answer it, fully. The answer will probably be published by Cardwell. In fact, it would have been impossible. The landlords were too prejudiced to listen to any arguments, even if they could have understood them. The only thing to be done was to beat the friends of the Government by the votes of the Opposition.

"Peel," he continued, "though he opposed Reform, was easily reconciled to it. His sympathies were not aristocratic. He opposed it principally because he thought it uncalled for. For years there had scarcely been a petition in its favour. He watched anxiously public opinion. He read every letter that he received. He often showed to me letters from obscure and, indeed, unknown people, and begged me to think them over. And he believed the educated majority to be opposed to reform—at least, on the scale on which Lord Grey proposed it. Grey was an unsafe leader. He had not much knowledge, and was constantly misled by his prejudices and his passions. He was very inferior in everything, except in person and manner and oratorical delivery, to his son."

"Could we have got," I said, "Poor Law reform from an unreformed House?"

"Certainly not," he answered.

"Or municipal reform?"

"No."

"Or Free Trade?"

“ Still less than any of them.”

“ Then,” I said, “ Parliamentary reform, though it may have been uncalled for, was necessary.”

‘ At dinner we talked of the Queen.

“ She is an excellent person of business,” said Lord Aberdeen. “ Though she reads all the diplomatic papers, she never keeps them for more than twelve hours. George IV. and William IV. used to read them, or, at least, to ask for them, but we could never get them back. At last we had everything copied that we sent to either of them. With the Queen this is unnecessary. She has the more merit as she does not like business, or, indeed, the gêne of royalty. She has often said to me that the Salic law was an admirable institution, the only wise law of Royal inheritance, and that she wished that it prevailed in England.”

“ I suppose,” I said, “ that she reads little except papers on business ?”

“ Scarcely anything,” he answered. “ The Prince reads everything. His knowledge is as remarkable as his intelligence.”

“ I send to him,” I said, “ my journals. Do you suppose that he reads them ?”

“ Every word of them,” answered Lord Aberdeen. “ He has often talked to me of them.”

“ On what footing at the Palace is Palmerston now ?” I asked.

“ On a very good one,” he answered, “ as far as I know.”

“ Has the Prince,” I asked, “ paid much attention to theological questions ?”

“ A good deal,” he answered. “ His opinions are German. They would shock most of our English divines. He used at one time to talk on such matters with the Bishop of Oxford, but there was a discrepancy so great that the discussion was not profitable, or even agreeable."

'A Member of the House of Commons, A. B., arrived yesterday evening.

'We took this morning a long walk before breakfast.

'We talked of the House of Commons.

'"My most intimate friends there," he said, "are Gladstone and Palmer."

'"They are supposed," I said, "to be Puseyites. Now, what is a Puseyite?"

'"A Puseyite," he answered, "is one who believes that those who belong to a Church ought to accept implicitly all her doctrines."

'"But belief," I said, "is involuntary. One has no more power over one's belief than over the colour of one's hair. I think that, on the whole, the doctrines of the Church of England contain the most sensible view of the Christian religion, and therefore I belong to that Church. But I dissent from many of her doctrines."

'"In that case," said A. B., "Gladstone would say that you ought to quit her Communion."

'"Then," I said, "he would split up the Church into thousands of sects, for the subject is so vast, the propositions are so numerous, and the evidence is so extensive and so different in value, that scarcely any two men—certainly not any two millions of men—would agree as to the details of their faith, though they might as to its outlines.”

“Perhaps not,” he answered, “if they gave full scope to the spirit of doubt and inquiry; but in a Puseyite that spirit is checked by reverence for the authority of the Church. He feels towards the Church, and towards the authorized expounders of her doctrines as I feel towards a lawyer or a physician. I may think the advice of the one or of the other strange, and may not be able to find any authority for it by looking myself into legal books or into medical ones, but I consider the fact that Counsellor C. or Dr. D. has said that it is so, to be evidence that it is so. It may not be conclusive evidence, but it satisfies me. I know that they are more likely to be right than I am.

“Gladstone’s great fault,” he added, “is the want of keeping in his mind. He seems incapable of estimating the relative force of arguments. He does not see that, though there may be valid objections to a measure, those objections perhaps ought to be disregarded.”

‘Lord Aberdeen had now joined us.

“I agree,” he said, “with A. B. that Gladstone does not weigh well against one another different arguments, each of which has a real foundation. But he is unrivalled in his power of proving that a specious argument has no real foundation. On the Succession Bill the whole Cabinet was against him. He delivered to us much the same speech which he made to the House of Commons. At its close we were all convinced. At this instant his whole soul is in Archdeacon Denison's case. He tells me that he cannot sleep for it, and writes to me volumes on volumes."

"Which," I said, "does he object to, the major or the minor premise? The proposition that the Thirty-nine Articles are the sole canon of orthodoxy, or that Archdeacon Denison's opinions are opposed to the Thirty-nine Articles?"

"To both," answered Lord Aberdeen. "He thinks that Denison ought to have been allowed to show that his doctrine, whether in accordance or not with the Articles, is in accordance with Scripture. And he thinks that the decision ought to have been in his case, as it was in Gorham's, that the Articles are comprehensive, that they admit Denison's view of the Eucharist as well as that of his opponents. I agree with him as to the latter proposition, but not as to the former."

'We talked of the kings under whom he had served.

"George the Third," he said, "was never quite sane. His cleverness was rather the cunning of a lunatic than the wisdom of a statesman. But he had great courage, moral as well as physical. George the Fourth had no courage, but he had talents and some knowledge, though rendered almost useless by his sensuality, selfishness, and indolence. He hated most of his Ministers; always called Eldon 'Old Bags' and Liverpool 'Mæcnas,' and would have got rid of them both if he had been able.

"Liverpool," he added, "has not had justice done to him. He carried on and finished triumphantly the greatest war in which we have ever been engaged. He kept together for seventeen years a Cabinet in which almost everybody was trying to undermine everybody else, and that always without the assistance of the Regent, often against his intrigues. He was thoroughly honest, even in debate. Lord Holland, a great sophist himself, used to say that Liverpool was the only fair arguer whom he had ever heard."

" "You have disposed," I said, "of George the Third and George the Fourth. What do you say of William?"

" "He was a Squire Western," answered Lord Aberdeen, "good-natured, rash and ignorant. He, too, had the courage of his family. In 1830, when the Government were afraid to let him dine with the Lord Mayor, he wished to go, and I believe that he might have gone, but we would not accept the responsibility."

'After breakfast we drove about a couple of miles to the Bullers of Buchan. Dr. Johnson, with his conciseness of words, though not of syllables, has described it as "a rock perpendicularly tubulated." The sea has broken in and excavated an arch at one end, through which it pours into the centre and forms a deep black lake, surrounded by precipices of granite, red where they are not green, or yellow with lichens. The sea was calm; in a storm the dash of the waves against the bold rocky promontories of this iron-bound coast, and their rush and reflux through the arch, must be grand.

'It reminded me of similar scenery on the coast of Pembrokehire and on that of Clare.'

'Wednesday, September 10.

'Bright, the Quaker member for Manchester, the acknowledged leader of the Peace Party, and, if that party have a leader, the leader of the Radicals, joined us this morning. He is a short, thick man, about forty-four or forty-five, with a flushed face and a bright, rather uneasy eye. For more than a year he has been suffering under determination of blood to the head. He is forbidden to speak in public, to employ his brains actively, and even to read anything beyond a newspaper. He has not entered the House of Commons since August, 1855. He attempted to do so in February last, but as soon as he was in the lobby the noise and lights and bustle made him giddy. He would have fallen if he had not been supported, and he took refuge in the library. His muscular strength is unimpaired. He can walk and fish all day, and is advised to live in the open air. Hopes of perfect recovery are held out to him, but as yet there is little improvement.

‘He talks with great ease and fluency, and as far as I have observed, with no reserve.

‘We rode and drove in a large party to Formartine, an old castle, formerly a seat of the Gordons, overlooking an extensive and finely wooded glen.

‘Lord Aberdeen, Bright, and I, wandered for a couple of hours along the steep sides of the glen and on the banks of the mountain-stream which intersects them.

‘We talked of the French alliance.

‘“What I fear,” said Lord Aberdeen, “from the alliance is, that it is too powerful, and that its power, like all power that is not controlled, will be abused. In Italian matters, however, I think that I see symptoms that Louis Napoleon is rather wiser than we are. He seems to be throwing cold water on our interference in the internal affairs of Naples. But in Greece the French are behaving as ill as we could do. Never was anything more monstrous than the French Admiral's refusing to acknowledge the Governor of the Piræus appointed by the King."

"Do you suppose," I said, "that we approve of that?"

"I have no doubt," answered Lord Aberdeen, "that we do. Palmerston was so worried by the French for his Pacifico* outrage that he is delighted to see them bullying the Greeks in their turn. If the occupation of the Piræus be not joint, it is concerted."

Thursday, September 11.—Lord Aberdeen, Bright, Lord Haddo, and I, stood and sat after breakfast on the southern terrace, basking in the autumnal sun.

'We talked of Maynooth.

"I never," said Bright, "have voted against Maynooth, but in the next Session, or, at all events, in the next Parliament, I think that I shall. I tried to persuade the Roman Catholic members to join me in voting against the Regium Donum.† They refused. 'We cannot,' they said, 'vote against the Regium Donum while we keep Maynooth.' 'Well,' I said, 'if your paltry £26,000 a year is such a fetter on you, I will try to relieve you from it.'"

"Have you," I said, "any other objection to May-

* A mob, headed by the son of a Greek Minister, plundered Don Pacifico, a Gibraltar Jew. King Otho refused even an inquiry into the matter. Palmerston blockaded the Piræus to extort an indemnity.

† Gift to the Presbyterians.

nooth? Does it do any harm beyond that of controlling in some degree the Irish members?"

"Yes," he said, "it takes £26,000 a year from the pockets of the people for purposes in which they do not sympathize."

"Do not we wish," I asked, "the Irish priests to be educated?"

"They have their seminary in Dublin," he answered, "and one near Birmingham, which can educate all that are wanted for Ireland and England. Many of those who are educated at Maynooth are intended for the Colonies. The English ought not to be taxed in so large a sum for such a purpose. The Colonies are now rich enough to educate their own priests. You may be sure that the days of Maynooth are numbered. All the anti-Catholics and all the voluntaries will vote against it from principle, and all the Tories from spite."

"I fear," said Lord Aberdeen, "that Mr. Bright is a true prophet. At the next election the hustings will be infested by anti-Maynooth pledges. If we lose Maynooth, we lose the Regium Donum. If the Catholics and the Presbyterians combine against us, as they did in 1798, we may have civil war."

"What was the result," I asked, "of the Commission of Inquiry on Maynooth?"

"The result," said Lord Aberdeen, "was that the only fault which the Commissioners found was that Maynooth does not teach Protestantism."

"The reports of Commissioners," said Bright, "are generally humbugs, and so are those of committees. The Commissioners and the committees are packed."

“It is a pity then,” said Lord Haddo, “that we spend £400,000 a year in printing Parliamentary papers, if even the best of them (which the reports are) appear to be valueless.”

“We do not spend,” said Bright, “more than £250,000 a year on our printing, and though the reports are of little value, the evidence is often important. Besides, if the money were not spent so, the Government would waste it in some worse way.”

“And yet,” I said to Lord Haddo, as we were separating, “he objects to our spending £26,000 a year on the education of the Catholic clergy for Ireland, England, and the Colonies.”

‘At dinner we talked of the House of Commons.

“I could give,” said Bright, “good advice to a new member—advice that would have been very useful to me. One part of it is, never to speak for at least the first year. Another is, to speak at first for only five minutes at a time. Another is, to be modest as respects yourself, but broad in your conclusions, and simple, perhaps trite, in your arguments.

“The House hates to be lectured—and it also hates subtilty, and long trains of reasoning and nice distinctions and qualifications. It cannot understand them, at least, it will not take the trouble to understand them. It is always in a fidget—partly, I have no doubt, in consequence of the physical discomfort. You breathe hot, dry air; you are chilled by draughts; you cannot lie or sit or stand without inconvenience. The House of Lords is comfortable, and so was our last House, which was the old House of Lords, but our present House was built in order to annoy us. There was a wish in high quarters to shorten our sittings by making them as uncomfortable as possible. Perhaps there was a wish to punish and tease us—and they have done it effectually.”

‘Bright was forced to leave us in the middle of dinner, but we found him apparently well in the drawing-room. We talked of the “Residence in Lucknow.”’

‘“I do not believe a word that is in it,” said Bright. “The book was written to order.

“Writing for the Government,” he added, “is now the best road to office. A barrister consulted me the other day as to buying a newspaper. ‘I shall lose money by it,’ he said, ‘but I shall get a place.’ Fonblanque has £1,500 a year for having abused the Radicals in the Examiner. Wilson has £2,000 a year for having abused them in the Economist. Greg has £1,200 a year for having performed similar services in the Edinburgh. The Morning Chronicle made Easthope a baronet. Perhaps it is as well that it should be so. When a man can write, it shows that he has at least something in him, though it may not be much. At all events, he is likely to be better than a Minister’s nominee. I believe that if you were to take the first ten men that you could catch in the Strand, they would be a much better set than any Cabinet that I have seen.”

‘“As respects our diplomatists,” said Lord Aberdeen, “I am not sure that I do not agree with you.”’

‘“You would like, then,” I said to Bright, “to revert to the old Greek mode of choosing your Government by lot from the mass of the people.

Aristotle considers a Government that is elected an aristocracy. He confines the term democracy to one that is caught by chance."

" "It must be a very unlucky chance," said Bright, "that would catch for you so bad a Minister as the Duke of Wellington. He cared nothing for the people. He thought only of the King or the Queen, and the House of Lords. And he did nothing but harm to both."

" "You must admit, at least," I said, "that he was useful to the Lords under Lord Melbourne, by preventing them from rushing into collision with the Commons."

" "I fear," said Lord Aberdeen, "that if troublesome times should recur, we shall feel the want of his moderating hand."

" "Those times," I said, "are, I hope, distant."

" "I hope that they are near," said Bright.

'Friday, September 12.—Bright has given up dining at table. When we dine he has tea and toast in his room. After dinner Lord Aberdeen, Bright, and I sat by the fire and talked about the war.

" "I have no doubt," said Bright, "that it might have been avoided. We ought to have forced Turkey to accept the Austrian Note, instead of exciting her to reject it."

" "Don't call it," said Lord Aberdeen, "the Austrian Note. It was prepared in France, sent to England for revisal, slightly altered by us, and sent on to Vienna, to be thence forwarded to St. Petersburg."

" "Was Louis Napoleon," I said, "desirous of peace? The general opinion here is that he wished for war."

“That opinion,” said Lord Aberdeen, “is founded naturally enough on the good which the war has done to him. But at that time he wished for peace. So did Austria, and so also did Russia.”

“And so,” I said, “did we.”

“Some of us,” answered Lord Aberdeen.

“I am not compelled,” said Bright, “to the reserves of office. I can say what Lord Aberdeen cannot. The man who made the war was Lord Stratford. It was he who suggested to the Turks an interpretation of the Note irritating to their pride. It was he who persuaded them to alter it, knowing that Nicholas had accepted it only on the condition that Turkey should accept it without alteration. He himself drew the Turkish declaration of war.

“I walked up and down the lobby of the House with Molesworth for an hour discussing with him whether he ought not to resign unless Lord Stratford were recalled. He repeated over and over that there could be no peace while that man was our Ambassador.”

“Every Minister,” said Lord Aberdeen, “has felt and said that in his turn. The fatal error was in sending him. The mischief had been done. It could not be cured by recalling him.”

“But could the war have been avoided,” I asked, “for more than a short time? Was not Russia resolved to do what we were resolved that she should not do?”

“I do not believe,” said Lord Aberdeen, “that Russia was resolved to do anything or was attempting to do anything which we were forced to prevent by war.

I do not believe that Nicholas had the least intention to take a strip of Turkish territory. He intended to frighten the Turks, to punish them, perhaps, for having yielded to Lavalette, by making them endure Menschikoff's insolence, but he intended nothing more. All that we had to do was to stand by, as we did in 1828 and 1829, and let the two barbarians settle their own affairs. Nothing mischievous or even dangerous to us could have come out of it. As for what are called Sir Hamilton Seymour's revelations, Nicholas, who was very free spoken, had been holding that language for years. He had said as much to every English Ambassador. Though he kept repeating that the man was very ill, he had no intention of poisoning him or robbing him."

'Bright now went from us to the tea-table.

"Is what Bright said of Lord Stratford true?" I asked Lord Aberdeen.

"Perfectly true," he answered. "I hear, however, that for the present, at least, Lord Stratford can no longer bully or intrigue to any purpose; that the French party, which during all the alliance he has been bitterly opposing, are now triumphant, and that he is a cipher."

"Now," I said, "that the war is over, that it has been successful, and that we have reduced Russia to a state in which she is no longer to be feared, is the war still to be regretted? Were not such results worth the expense?"

"No," answered Lord Aberdeen. "The war, successful as I admit it to have been, is a great calamity. It has broken up a friendship of three hundred years. It has substituted the French alliance for the Russian. It has given us a fickle, treacherous friend instead of a firm one—a friend whose interests are opposed to ours, for one with whom we have no real cause of quarrel. It has made France the arbiter of Europe. Louis Napoleon cannot stand still; his coronation may occupy the people for some time, the Bourse for another. But military glory and political supremacy are the real passions of France. He must do something to gratify them, and he can do nothing that we shall like. Savoy will probably be his first object. The French covet that still more than they do Belgium. Even Guizot could not talk of the loss of Savoy with patience. It was the only part of the treaties of 1815 to which he could not submit.”

“Savoy,” I said, “is in the hands of the priests. When I was at Turin, in 1846, the favourite scheme of the Liberal party was to get Lombardy through the assistance of France, and to buy that assistance by the cession of Savoy. But the priests were opposed to it. They are ultramontane, and the Government of Louis Philippe was anti-papal. The Republic was still more so. But now that Turin is anti-papal and that France is ultramontane, they are said to be desirous to be transferred from Piedmont to France.”

“Some such arrangement as that,” said Lord Aberdeen, “is not improbable. Louis Napoleon’s passion at present is to get the Pope to his coronation. This is the key to his Italian policy. He may bluster about Naples, but I doubt his proceeding to extremities against a friend of the Pope—at least, until the Pope has crowned him, or has refused to do so. As soon as that matter has been disposed of one way or another, it does not much signify which, the Pope had better be on his guard."

"On what terms," I said, "are Russia and Austria?"

"On those," he answered, "of the bitterest hatred."

"Is that good," I asked, "for us?"

"No," he answered. "The Duke's policy was to unite Russia, Prussia, and Austria. They are our protection against France. France is far stronger and far more dangerous than all of them put together."

"What are the relations between Austria and Prussia?" I asked.

"Great intimacy," he answered, "between the sovereigns; great dislike between the people.

"I cannot conceive," he added, "anything more mad than the desire for another year's war. We were assisting our future enemy to crush our future ally. Yet many people wished for it. L'appétit vient en mangeant, particularly when men are eating their fellow-creatures. The Queen entered into the war with horror. She very soon got to like it very much."

'Bright came back from the tea-table. He had overheard, I fancy, the last two or three words.

"The Queen," he said, "had better take care. She is flattering the army. We shall not stand that. I hear that we are fortifying Malta and Gibraltar. They ought to be given up."

"Malta," said Lord Aberdeen, "we cannot do without, but I wish that we were well rid of Gibraltar."

'This called up Lord Aberdeen's brother, Admiral Gordon, who was reading at the tea-table.

“If you had seen,” he said, “the Gut of Gibraltar as I have seen it, absolutely swarming with privateers, you would wish to keep Gibraltar. Without it our trade might be almost excluded from the Mediterranean.”

“It is not a practical question,” said Lord Aberdeen, “for no Minister could surrender it; but we pay heavily in peace for its services in war.”

‘Saturday, September 13.—We talked at breakfast of Lord George Bentinck.

“He was the most ignorant man,” said Lord Aberdeen, “that ever led a party, and perhaps the most prejudiced. He was always convinced that those who differed from him were rogues. His experience, indeed, had been chiefly in the dishonest world.”

“Lord John Fitzroy,” said Bright, “told me that he had known Lord George intimately from a boy, and that he never forgave. When first the abandonment of Protection by Peel was rumoured in 1845, he wrote to Lord John Fitzroy a letter in which he threatened vengeance against every member of that Cabinet if they sold, as he called it, the party. And he kept his word. And yet, as he told me, he saved by Free Trade in oats £1,500 a year. He maintained, too, the Game Laws, though he never shot. He was every inch an aristocrat.”

‘After breakfast I took a long walk with Lord Aberdeen.

‘We talked of wars to preserve the balance of power.

“I do not go so far as Bright,” said Lord Aberdeen, “and deny that such wars can be justifiable, or, what is the same thing, can be necessary. It was necessary to resist Charles V., Louis XIV., and Napoleon.

“If Nicholas had had the aggressive intentions which were ascribed to him, it would have been necessary to restrain him. But, as I have said before, I do not believe that he had any such intentions; I do not believe that he wished to do more than to consolidate, perhaps to increase, his influence, and it is not held that the amount of mere influence which one nation exercises over another is a ground for war.”

“Was not,” I said, “his occupation of Moldavia and Wallachia a ground for war?”

“Certainly,” he answered; “that was an overt act. But our summoning him to evacuate those provinces within one month added enormously to the importance of his occupation of them. It was not to be expected that a great Sovereign, forced to consult the feelings of a semi-barbarous, and therefore proud and irritable, people, could submit to such a dictation. I opposed it in the Cabinet, but was out-voted. It was virtually a declaration of war, for it made it a point of honour with him that he should keep the provinces, and with us that he should quit them. But it satisfied the English public, who thought that the month’s delay was an attempt at peace.”

“What,” I asked, “were the Olmütz negotiations?”

“They are little known,” he answered, “in this country. They were our last chance of peace.

“The Emperors of Russia and Austria and the King of Prussia met at Olmütz soon after the failure of what has been called the ‘Vienna Note.’* They were all anxious for peace. With considerable difficulty the two other Sovereigns persuaded Nicholas to accept the Note, with the Turkish alterations. But the Turks, acting, I have no doubt, under the advice of Lord Stratford, now retracted, and we, again against my opinion, following out, whenever it suited the war party, the theory of Turkish independence, refused to compel them to adhere to their own proposal. We were thus guilty of what was very like a breach of faith to Russia. England and France, speaking for the whole coalition, offered to her certain terms. She accepted them. Turkey required them to be modified. Russia at first rejected, but afterwards accepted, the modification. It was sharp practice to say, 'It is now too late. If you had accepted the Turkish modification in time, we would have held her to it, but she has taken advantage of your first refusal, and shaken herself free.'"

* See p. 212.

"Do you foresee," I asked, "any immediate danger to our alliance?"

"I do not," he answered. "At present it is obviously Louis Napoleon's interest to be faithful to us, especially as we allow him to have his own way. But, of course, as soon as it is his interest—or, rather, as soon as he thinks that it is his interest—to break with us, he will do so. We must recollect, too, that the war, while it has strengthened him, has also strengthened another power in France—the army. He despises, as I well know, Canrobert and Pelissier, yet you see how he is courting them.

"No prospect of advantage would have tempted Charles X. or Louis Philippe to attack us. A very slight balance of advantage would decide him to do so. He is, in fact, our only formidable enemy, for I suppose no one is wild enough to fear an invasion from Russia. One consequence of our fear of him is that we must keep up a larger army and a larger fleet than we have been accustomed to, and this will be dangerous as well as expensive. Half the proverbs that are quoted as wisdom are folly, and there is none more foolish than ‘Si vis pacem bellum para.’

The Greek one—

ἔλκει τὸν ἄνδρα σίδηρος—

is the true one. It is almost impossible to have a large military force without being tempted to use it. We are not, perhaps, ambitious of territory, but we are of influence. An English Minister must please the newspapers, and the newspapers are always bawling for interference. They are bullies, and they make the Government bully. If we had not been armed to the teeth, we should not have run into these follies in Naples and Greece.”

“The necessity of keeping up a large military force seems to me,” I said, “to be the peculiar evil which the prevalence of despotism on the Continent inflicts on us. Despots are the only persons to whom war, or the preparation for war, costs nothing. Their incomes, as respects their personal wants, are unbounded. If they like to amuse themselves with large armies and fleets they can force their subjects to waste on them all beyond a bare subsistence, and we cannot in prudence remain comparatively unarmed. A despot with military propensities is like a rich man who devotes his whole surplus income to going to law with his neighbours. If, instead of having a good house and dogs and horses, he feeds an army of attorneys, they are forced to do so too."

"Our peace party," said Lord Aberdeen, "by its violence has almost thrown discredit on peacefulness. Bright is a curious example of the meeting of extremes. He cannot tolerate war, but has a penchant towards assassination."

"I shall try," I said, "to extract from him his political creed. I have no doubt that it will be found to be much more moderate than might be inferred from the anarchical paradoxes with which he amuses himself."

"Perhaps," said Lord Aberdeen, "he may think that he is here among a set of aristocrats, and that he ought to hoist his reddest Radical flag, and not only nail it to the staff, but keep waving it before our eyes."

"I am not sure that he is wrong when he expects troublous times—more troublesome than any we have witnessed. Now, that is to say, since the Reform Bill, we are really trying the experiment of a mixed form of government."

"Under the Tudors and Stuarts our Government was essentially a monarchy; under the Georges it was an aristocracy. The great families had it all their own way. The Reform, while it has weakened the aristocratic element, has strengthened the monarchic one, and has almost created the democratic one. The Constitution now really contains all the three elements."

The monarchic, of course, is the weakest, but still its force is considerable: it can give a casting vote; it did give one on the Reform Bill. I often think of Cicero's aphorism, that if a Government formed of the three elements could be established, it would not be desirable."

"I do not see," I said, "any signs of revolution, meaning by revolution a change in the depositories of power, effected by force."

"Nor do I," answered Lord Aberdeen; "but what has happened may happen again. The Queen is eminently popular, and so perhaps is the Crown; but we may have a George the Fourth or a King Ernest. I fear that the House of Commons is losing not only popularity but respect. We seem to me to be on an inclined plane. Up to the present time the infusion of democracy has done good—not unmixed, but still good—to an extent far exceeding its evil. But the tendency of that element is always to grow. Will the next Reform Bill be an improvement? Will the one after that? Now that the practice of bidding for popularity by Reform Bills has been introduced, it will scarcely be abandoned. You will always have a statesman tempted by so short a cut to power. The days of aristocratic preponderance appear to be numbered, and I regret it."

"Our social aristocracy," I said, "seems to me to be of a kind that never existed before. It does not depend, like that of the Continent, on birth; it does not depend, like that of America, on wealth: it is an aristocracy of manners."

"Are not manners," said Lord Aberdeen, "too conventional to be the foundation of an aristocracy?"

"I do not mean," I said, "conventional manners, but the social habits which really conduce to the comfort and pleasure of society."

"Even those," said Lord Aberdeen, "are to some extent conventional. We dislike certain expressions and certain acts which in themselves are indifferent. In general, I like the Americans; but I find they offend many people by things in which I see no harm."

"That must arise," I said, "from association. We consider those things as indicative of other habits or other feelings, which are substantially offensive. We refuse to live with a person tainted by the latter. This excludes the nouveaux riches in the first generation: in the second they are on a par with everybody."

'Sunday, September 14.—We went to the kirk. Though the day was wet it was quite full. The minister prayed for better weather.

'I said to Lord Haddo that the unwritten prayers distracted me, that I was unable to join in them, as I was always guessing what might be coming, and considering how far I approved of what was passed.

"Our minister," he answered, "though a very good man, is not a very intelligent one. Prayers might easily be written better than he can invent. But your objection that you are always guessing what may be coming is not felt by his accustomed audience. The ministers vary their prayers much; they learn them by heart, and so does the congregation, and when you like the ministers, you get in time to prefer the forms of the kirk to those of the Episcopal Church. You cannot account now for the Free Kirk agitation. In the Episcopal Church it is of comparatively little importance to the higher classes what their clergyman may be. They can almost always read at home better sermons than they can hear, and no one can spoil the prayers of the English liturgy. They allow him to be appointed by family interest, or by political connection, or even by purchase. But a Presbyterian is dependent on his minister, not only for the sermon, but for what is ten times more important to all classes, and is the only important thing to the educated classes, the prayers. It is impossible to join in the prayers of a fool or of a rogue. If we disapprove of our minister intellectually or morally, we can scarcely attend with any profit to the services of the kirk. The question of patronage was, therefore, a vital one. I do not wonder at the eagerness with which it was grasped at, or at the sacrifices made to retain it."

'At luncheon we talked of Walter Scott.

"'I was present," said Lord Aberdeen, "when a man asked him, somewhat bluntly, which of the Waverley novels he preferred. After a moment's silence he answered, 'Old Mortality.' He sometimes carried his attempts at mystery a little too far. I once said something which he thought implied that I assumed him to be the author of the novels. 'I give you my word of honour,' he said, 'that I know no more about their authorship than you do.' The mystery became very mischievous as soon as he wrote history. If he had announced in his own name his intention to write the life of Napoleon, information of all kinds, much of which is now lost, would have poured in upon him. No one could offer facts or documents to an anonymous historian."

'In the afternoon I took a long walk with Bright.

"You have told us," I said, "many of your opinions and of your wishes, and I am sure that in your mind they are parts of a system, that there is some leading theory which they all follow, some seminal idea from which they all spring."

"Of course," he said, "I have not been a public man for so many years and escaped having a theory and a system. I do not expect it to please you, but if you think that it will amuse you, you shall have it."

"As far as pure theory goes, I am a Republican, and so, I suppose, are you. No one if he had a Constitution to construct would trust the management of public affairs to one man, or to any set of men, not selected and controlled by the people. But we are an old country and a prosperous one, and I should be very sorry to endanger our present advantages by any great or any sudden changes."

"I suppose," I said, "that you would elect your House of Commons by ballot, and universal suffrage given in electoral districts?"

"By ballot," he answered, "certainly; but I am not for carving the country into parallelograms of space, or even of numbers. Space, indeed, is not an element which I acknowledge. I should take something like a mean of numbers and wealth. Generally they go together, and are accompanied by intelligence. I don't object to universal suffrage, but I am not anxious for it. I object to the £10 suffrage, because it excludes, indeed was meant to exclude, the working classes. I should be satisfied with household suffrage. It is the old system ; it is the parochial system, and it does not exclude any class."

"The great advantage," I said, "of universal suffrage is that when you have it you have got to the bottom. One source of discontent and agitation is dried up. Household suffrage lets in the uneducated classes, and does not compensate for that inconvenience by excluding no one."

"It excludes no class," he answered.

"Not the lodgers?" I replied.

"No," he said, "for no one need be a lodger."

"Not the unmarried men?" I asked.

"Those who are unmarried at twenty-one," he answered, "are too few to be important, and they are the worst part of our population. However, if you wish for universal suffrage, you may have it."

"How long," I asked, "are your Parliaments to last?"

"For two years," he answered, "or even for three. And I would not allow them to be dissolved. Subjection to dissolution destroys the independence of the House."

"Would you keep the House of Lords?"

"Yes, with such a House of Commons the peers would behave themselves. They would not reject the Jew Bill session after session. Of course I would have no bishops among them."

"Would you keep the Crown?"

"Yes, but I would take from it the army and put it under the House of Commons ; that is to say, put it, like the navy, in the hands of a Parliamentary Board. The military patronage gives some fifty members, not to the Government, but to the Crown. The influence of a Minister over the House may often be useful; that of the Crown is almost always mischievous. There cannot be a worse party than the King's friends.

“Then I would deprive the Crown of the power of making treaties. A Minister ought not to be able to entangle us without our knowledge in an alliance or a guarantee which may produce a war fifty years hence. All our diplomacy should be above-board. Every diplomatic note, sent or received, should be published within two weeks in the Times. Three-fourths of our foreign envoys should be recalled. Most of them are positively mischievous. I had rather that they should receive their salaries for staying at home than for intriguing against the Liberals abroad.”

“How would you deal with the Church?” I asked.

“I would separate it,” he answered, “from the State. The endowments which it received from the State are public property, and should revert to the State. If individuals choose to endow it they may, as they may endow the Methodist Church, or the Roman Catholic Church. The only sensible system is the voluntary system. It supports all the Dissenting Churches; it supports all the American Churches. The Church of England, whatever be its faults, is not so bad as to be incapable of voluntary support. We should then only have as much of it as was wanted.”

“What would you do about education?” I asked.

“I would not,” he answered, “compel the parents to send their children to school, but I would compel them to pay for good schools, and the children would find their way to them. I would require parishes to raise rates for establishing and keeping up schools, and I would take care that there should be good masters, well paid. Then I would abolish primogeniture."

"You do not mean," I said, "to fetter wills or settlements?"

"Not further," he answered, "than by prohibiting any entail beyond a life and a reversion in fee. All ownerships beyond life ownerships should be absolute."

"Your abolition of primogeniture, then," I said, "is to take effect only in the absence of a will or a settlement?"

"Exactly so."

"Then it would not produce much effect. Few men die intestate, certainly not those who wish to make eldest sons."

"You are mistaken," he replied. "Many of the middle classes buy land, and forget or dislike to make a will. It costs money; it forces you to explain your private affairs to an attorney. Many persons have a superstitious dread of doing so. I have known hundreds of cases in which primogeniture has worked cruel injustice, and has defeated the wishes of the intestate."

"Then," I said, "by all means get rid of it, for it does no good to compensate for the harm."

"The last reform," he added, "that occurs to me is in taxation. I would impose a heavy income-tax on all realized property. William the Third's four shillings in the pound land-tax was the best act of his reign. I would prohibit loans : all the supplies should be raised within the year. Under such a system you would not have much war.”

‘Monday, September 15.—I walked with Lord Aberdeen, and reported to him Bright’s political confession of faith.

“As I expected it to be,” said Lord Aberdeen ; “it is much less wild than his ordinary talk. I am not sure that fifty years hence something resembling his system may not be adopted. I agree with you that if power is to be given to the uneducated majority, universal suffrage is preferable to household suffrage. I believe that in ordinary times universal suffrage would give you a respectable House of Commons—perhaps a better than we have now. But from time to time some delusion blinds and excites the masses ; instead of confining themselves to the only duty which they can be conceived capable of performing—the selection of rulers—they attempt to rule. And then there is no saying what mischief they may do, or what good they may prevent. They would have prevented Catholic emancipation ; they would now destroy Maynooth. I even believe that if England were polled it would be found Protectionist. But household suffrage is in this respect as bad as universal suffrage. The householders are a perpendicular section of the whole, and much the largest at bottom.

“His ecclesiastical changes,” continued Lord Aberdeen, “would give us a clergy with more influence over the lower orders, but scarcely any over the higher classes. And, perhaps, if their influence over the lower orders were always usefully exerted, this might be a gain. But they would be forced to preach ad crumenam. Our Scotch clergy, though endowed, are more on a par with their flocks than the English, and have more influence over them; but I doubt whether the Scotch are a more moral people than the English. They have much more of the appearance of religion, are much fonder of long prayers and long sermons, and Sabbatarianism; but I have no reason to think that they are better people.

““No one in England,” he added, “is in so false a position as a bishop. He is a peer, he is a great man, he lives with great people, he has to head every subscription, he has to attend Parliament, he has to travel over his diocese, he has to entertain his clergy, he has to provide for his family; and for all this he has between four and five thousand a year, and only for his life—an income which is thought small, even if arising from inheritable property, for a temporal peer who is not subject to half the claims which press on a bishop. Comparing their wants with their incomes, I believe that the bishops are the poorest people in England.”

‘In the evening we talked of the Factory Acts. I found, as I expected, Bright furious against them.

““Why are we mill-owners,” he said, “to be selected as the subjects of interference? Why is a Scotchman to be sent to see how I work my people, while the farmer, and the carpenter, and the builder, and the tailor is left to the ordinary responsibilities of law and public opinion? Are we worse educated than they are? Are our people less intelligent, more ready to submit to oppression, or more easy to manage? It was proposed the other day to force us to spend millions in boxing off our machinery. We have in our mills about 1,000 workpeople. In fifteen years we have had five accidents. We have three carters. In the same space of time two of them have been killed. I have no doubt that in agricultural employments accidents are a hundred times more frequent in proportion to the numbers employed, than those which occur in factories. But we are unpopular, we are envied, we are supposed to be rich, we are Radicals, and Whigs and Tories combine to gain popularity by calumniating us and robbing us. I have advised my partners, if this machinery Bill passes, to set the example of turning the key on the doors of our mills, and to throw on the legislators the responsibility of feeding the millions whom they will not allow us to employ with a profit.”

‘Tuesday, September 16.—I walked with Lord Aberdeen for about an hour before breakfast.

‘We talked of Molesworth.

‘“Several of my friends,” he said, “thought that a coalition Cabinet ought to contain a Radical member. I did not expect much from Molesworth, though I did not object to him. But he was a failure. Until the war he was a mere cipher. When the war had broken out, and was popular, he became outrageously warlike.

‘“With all his faults,” continued Lord Aberdeen, “and they are many and great, Lord John is one of our best public men. He has great merits as well as great defects. He has boldness, decision, knowledge both of principles and of details, and liberal and comprehensive views and sympathies. His worst moral fault is rashness. His worst intellectual fault is precipitation. Only a week before his unhappy Durham letter, he wrote to the Bishop of London to say that the Papal aggression was an absurdity to be only laughed at."

"I was in Italy," I said, "at the time of the Papal aggression. When I returned, one of the first persons that I saw was Lord Clarendon. I alluded with regret to the Durham letter and to the Episcopal Titles Bill.

"'It is very well,' said Lord Clarendon, 'to laugh now at Papal aggression, but if you had been here at the time, you would have seen that such was the state of public opinion that we had to choose only between either taking the matter seriously, talking big, and doing ourselves the little that was really possible, or going out and letting it be done by Stanley.'

"I think Clarendon utterly wrong," he answered. "In the first place, I do not think that there was excitement enough to endanger the Government if it had remained quiet; but secondly, the excitement, such as it was, was mainly caused by the Durham letter.

"When the Prime Minister told the Protestants of the three kingdoms that they were injured, insulted, and endangered, they naturally believed him. They would have believed him if he had told them, what, in fact, was true, that the Bull was a matter in which they had no concern, that it merely put the relations between Rome and our Catholic fellow-subjects on a more convenient footing, and diminished instead of increasing the Pope's power of interference in England.

“Lord John’s great fault,” continued Lord Aberdeen, “is that he cannot resign himself to the post for which he is really fit—that of the head of a department. He always thinks that he ought to be the head of the Ministry. This feeling, inflamed as it is by his domestic flatterers, makes him restless, dissatisfied, and negligent. He does not give his soul to his duties as a subordinate, and is always ready to show up his colleagues if he is thwarted, or finds them troublesome. When he breaks up a Ministry, he thinks that he is dethroning a usurper.”

‘At breakfast we talked of Thiers’ last volumes.

“They are not fair to the Duke of Wellington,” said Lord Aberdeen, “but they are less unfavourable than I expected. The Duke was not a man whom Thiers could understand.”

“In conversation,” I said, “he usually puts him in the first rank of the second rates—below Cæsar, Hannibal, Alexander, or Napoleon, but on a par with Turenne or Condé.”

“That was his civility,” said Lord Aberdeen, “and in a Frenchman’s civility there is always some insolence.”

‘I left Haddo House that evening.

CHAPTER X.

LATER FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

IN 1857 Mr. Senior was put on the Royal Commission for Education. Most of his colleagues were already our friends; it drew us nearer to them, and also brought several valuable additions to our circle.

At its head was the Duke of Newcastle. He was exceedingly attractive; his beautiful manners and graceful, dignified bearing made him like a prince in a fairy tale. He asked us to spend the Christmas of 1860-61 with him at Clumber. It was a frightfully severe winter, and the large house, uninhabited except by the host and our two selves, seemed cold and dreary. Neither wife nor child was there, and outside a dismal expanse of snow. I was not, however, in the least bored, for there was a melancholy romance about it all which moved my imagination. In a few days Sir Edward and Lady and Miss Head arrived, and the speaker, Lord Ossington. They were all very agreeable, but the weird charm was broken, and the atmosphere became more prosaic.

The Rev. William Rogers ('Hang theology Rogers,' as he was called) was another friend whom we owed to the Education Commission. He was delightful company, very original, unconventional, and full of fun. His noble, disinterested efforts at civilizing the East End were just beginning to be recognized, and I have always thought that they deserved a higher reward than a City living. I remember the pleasure it gave us to go over the enormous schools of St. Thomas, on which he spent time, talents, and money. The children were remarkably intelligent, and read aloud especially well, much better than the majority of boys, and even men, brought up in our great public schools. He was on excellent terms with his parishioners of all sorts. I used laughingly to tell him that he was hand-in-glove with all the thieves in London, and when a favourite little King Charles* of mine was stolen, I applied to him to recover my pet. He replied :

‘ May 1.

‘ . . . I have put your case into the hands of the most skilful of detectives, whose special vocation it is to look up dogs, and if Fan has not been placed in a situation to garnish a turkey (the season is in your favour), my friend will find her out.

‘ I passed your house the other day at the time when I knew the kettle boiled, panting for sweet converse and a cup of bohea. Conceive my dismay at finding the shutters closed. I tore the last lock from my bald head, and rushed into a neighbouring greengrocer’s for a bottle of penny gingerbeer. I need hardly say that it neither cheered nor inebriated me. I have been wretched ever since, till your letter infused some hope into me. I hope I may be instrumental in restoring

* She had the honour of being immortalized by George Frederick Watts.

Fan to your arms ; it will be the proudest moment of my life.'

Dog lovers will be glad to hear that Mr. Rogers' efforts were successful. Fan came back, but she had been so ill-treated that she had lost an eye.

Some years afterwards, when he was Rector of Bishopsgate, Mr. Rogers gave grand balls to his parishioners, to one of which, when I had young people about me, I had the honour of being invited. Nothing could be better done or more amusing. These balls took place in a large, vaulted school-room. At one end was a daïs. At 9.30 the folding doors at the other end were thrown open, and a procession advanced. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress (the former in official dress) led the way, followed by our host in his wheeled chair (for he was lame, the result of an accident). The band struck up, and the grandees took their places on the daïs. The dancing then went on merrily, much better organized than in an ordinary ball-room, for there were Masters of the Ceremonies, who took care that there should be no jostling and crowding. Some of the girls, especially the Jewesses, were extremely pretty.

Another member of the Commission, of which Fitzjames Stephen was secretary, was Dean Lake. He and Mr. Brookfield and Mr. Rogers constantly dined at our house. Much business, we were told, was transacted by them after we ladies had retired, but during dinner there was more fun and laughter than anything else. Another very interesting acquaintance that we made during the Commission was Miss Carpenter, whose life was entirely devoted to reclaiming outcasts, and educating the children of the poor. My father was so busy in London that he sent me to look at her Ragged Schools, and I spent two interesting days with her in the Red House, Bristol, where we were waited on by two obliging little thieves. It was here that I made acquaintance with my dear friend Miss Cobbe, whose voluntary exile from London I never cease to deplore. At that time she was living with Miss Carpenter, and helping in her work. What struck me in the schools was the freshness of the atmosphere, which, considering the class of children, proved that the unpleasant closeness one feels in visiting ordinary schools is not inevitable. These two ladies, in whose work Miss Elliot, the Dean's daughter, was closely associated, lead very useful active lives. Their keen sense of humour must have been a great support to them, for their spirits were not subdued by the trying scenes around them.

Mr. Rogers and Mr. Brookfield belonged to a group of my father's friends considerably younger than he was, who naturally survived him, although few of them attained to real old age.

The most widely known was Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton). No party was complete without him, and if by any chance his friends forgot to send him an invitation, he relied on his universal popularity, and presented himself without one, for which Sydney Smith dubbed him the 'cool of the evening.' No one, except Mrs. Grote, ever ventured to snub him. His imaginative humorous talk and hearty laugh are still fresh in the memory of all who knew him. He had the good fortune to marry the sister of the late, and mother of the present, Lord Crewe, and at her brother's and her husband's houses in town and country she made a delightful hostess. People of all sorts met at Lord Houghton's; you were sure to see there the most recent lion and the newest beauty. He was great at breakfast-parties. I remember on one occasion, when none but potent and reverend seigniors, such as Whately and Lansdowne and Macaulay were present, his breaking out with, 'Any man who lives beyond thirty-six may be sure that he is nothing very particular,' and the burst of laughter which followed. He was most amusing at Frystone, his house in the country. We met there on one occasion Lord and Lady Mount-Temple, Miss Davenport Bromley, Chadwick, Miss Carpenter, Mrs. Jameson, and some smart people whose names I cannot remember, and last, not least, Mr. Brookfield, who read Shakespeare to us in the evening. Lord Houghton was an excellent host, overlooking nobody, but he was a despot. He arranged all that we were to do all day, with whom to walk, drive, etc., and it was a great comfort to let one's free will and responsibility go to sleep. I think a party in Cornwall Gardens was the very last he ever dined at before he went abroad and shortly afterwards died. It was to meet the Duc de Broglie, and the two discussed English society and French poetry to our great edification and amusement.

One of our oldest and longest friendships was with Henry Reeve, C.B., the Editor of the Edinburgh Review and the 'Greville Memoirs.' We knew him for at least fifty years, during which he was a most kind and agreeable friend to us all. He shared my father's social and cosmopolitan tastes, and we lived in much the same circle at home and abroad. He belonged to the same political school, preserved the same old Liberal traditions, believed in political economy, and did not approve of much State interference or Socialism of any sort.

Herman Merivale, Assistant-Secretary at the Colonial Office, and afterwards for India, was another true and constant friend, helpful and genial, a charming companion, full of information and ability, and absolutely without pretension. He was entirely without vanity, for which reason I think he was hardly appreciated at his full value. His volume of 'Historical Essays' did not meet with the popularity which such a charming book deserved. To this, however, he was completely indifferent. His manner, indeed, generally gave the impression of calm indifference, but beneath was a most tender heart. He never recovered the tragical death of his daughter Mrs. Trench, and the Indian Famine disturbed the peace of his last days.

After my marriage, in 1865, we had the good fortune to find the Merivales in the next house to the one we took in Cornwall Gardens. They were the most delightful neighbours imaginable. Mrs. Merivale, although chained to her seat by rheumatism, was full of life and fun. Her friends flocked round her, and one heard more news in her drawing-room of an afternoon than anywhere else. She did not long survive her husband, and we paid the penalty for having had such exceptional neighbours in the blank they left behind.

Herman Merivale's brother, the historian, and Dean of Ely, was another link between us, for he had been my husband's tutor at Cambridge. We found him a very agreeable addition to our circle whenever he came to London.

One of Herman Merivale's intimate college friends was Cardinal Manning. He never would dine out or come to any sort of party, but he occasionally came to the Merivales' in the evening, and they were so kind as to invite my husband and me to look in also, which we never failed to do, as we were very glad of the opportunity of meeting His Eminence, who looked like a mediæval saint.

Another of our best friends was the Rev. William Brookfield. He was one of the most brilliant talkers I ever came across. His stories were irresistible, and his mimicry, never ill-natured or exaggerated, brought whomsoever he pleased before his hearers, not only in manner, but in the flavour of their mind and conversation. No one since Sydney Smith ever made us laugh so much, and yet we felt that there was a serious side, almost a dark background, to all this merriment. He was tall, dark, and strikingly handsome; a very fine preacher, and an admirable reader. He was so kind as to read a play of Shakespeare's once in every year to a chosen audience in our house. It was far better than seeing Hamlet on the stage, for there was no imperfection to mar the beauty of the whole. To my mind his reading was superior to Mr. Brandram's: he had a beautiful deep-toned voice and no tricks; he did not use falsetto in the female parts.

Another friend whom we were fortunate enough to preserve for many years was George Stovin Venables, the eminent Parliamentary barrister. His friendship for my father descended to us, and I never can forget his constant kindness. Happily for us, his life was extended beyond the limit grudgingly allotted to us by the Psalmist, and yet he seemed full of power when he was taken away. His conversation was very remarkable, his memory was prodigious; for a long period he contributed the yearly 'Summary of Events' to the Times, and he used to dictate column after column without a note. He was full of wit and dry, somewhat caustic, humour, and did not always spare his interlocutors, but his severity was only skin deep, and he was the kindest of friends and the most hospitable of hosts. To children, even babies, and to young people, he was indulgence itself, and they were never in the least afraid of him.

Another of this little band of Cambridge men* was my dear old friend Sir Edward Bunbury. He and Lord Houghton belonged to the Cambridge A. D. C. (acting club), and he amused us very much one day by describing how they performed in 'Romeo and Juliet.' He was a great talker, very good-natured, interesting and entertaining, and also very learned, though not in the least pedantic, and a very agreeable member of society. I look back with great enjoyment to the two visits we paid to him after he inherited Barton. The house was full of fine pictures and rare books. I was especially interested in the more serious drawings of his ancestor, the celebrated caricaturist; they showed a deep feeling for beauty and pastoral scenes, very like Morland's pictures.

* Almost all these men were members of the Apostles' Club, to which Tennyson, Trench, and the most distinguished undergraduates of their day, belonged. I wish we had known more of Tennyson. My father greatly admired his poems, especially 'Queen Guinevere.' I can only remember distinctly meeting him four times. Once he came in and talked very agreeably when I was sitting to Watts; again at the Brookfields', when he read 'Boadicea' and 'The Northern Farmer'; another time at a party given by his daughter-in-law; and once more when I went with Mme. Mohl to call on him in the Albert Mansions.

Another Apostle was the late James Spedding, who devoted his life to editing Bacon. He was one of the most amiable of men, and a great favourite with us all. He would talk on the most interesting psychological thesis undisturbed in a room full of noise and company. It was quite restful to see his bald head reaching, like a snowy mountain-top, above the madding crowd, and to sit in a corner with him listening to his calm discourse.

There are some people who seem to diffuse happiness. Sometimes this fairy gift of manner extends to a whole family, as in the case of the Villiers and Arnolds. Dr. Arnold was a friend of my father's, but I never saw him; we all, however, were intimate with the younger generation. No one ever possessed the charm of manner in higher perfection than Matthew Arnold; he was 'sweetness and light' personified. He never forgot an old friend, and nowhere was he so charming as in the bosom of his family. He preserved his youth, his buoyant spirits, and good looks to the last, and when one considers the sad endings to so many valuable lives, even those nearest and dearest to him can hardly grudge him the painless death, with powers unimpaired, which was his portion in this world.

I first met Kinglake at one of the Milmans' pleasant parties at Westminster. It was soon after the appearance of 'Eöthen,' and I knew him intimately to the very end of his life. There are still many left who personally remember him, but for the last few years his failing health, ending in painful illness borne with extraordinary patience and fortitude, made him an exile from society. No one was more witty, in a very quiet way; he had a keen sense of humour hidden under a very gentle, shy manner, and a slow way of speaking. He was exceedingly courteous to women, and very generous to all who needed his help.

It was a great pleasure to pay him long visits, as I did when he could no longer come to see me, in his house at Richmond, and at last in his charming rooms overlooking Kensington Gardens, in the Bayswater Road.

His mind never gave way, although after his serious illness he had some difficulty in speaking. He was pale, small, and delicate in appearance, and probably for that very reason appreciated physical strength and beauty above other gifts. He would have given anything to be a successful soldier. He had the éloquence du billet in a supreme degree; he could not write the shortest note of refusal or acceptance without wording it in such a manner as made one feel stroked the right way, and consequently risen in one's own estimation.

All our circle had a great liking and respect for Richard Doyle; we admired his conscientious refusal to draw any more for Punch after that paper spoke evil of the Pope. He was full of gentle fun, and his tact was never at fault. If a guest was either shy or stupid or fastidious, all went right if Dicky Doyle sat beside her. He was happily spared to us for many years, and to the end of his life we constantly saw him. He would ask us frequently to come to see his sketches and pictures, full of delicate and humorous fancies. I remember telling him the story of the 'Fifty Red Nightcaps,' which he afterwards amusingly illustrated.

There was no more welcome guest at Hyde Park Gate than Sir James Lacaita. He was in prison when we were at Naples, but he soon came to London, where he was a great favourite, and married a Scotch lady. He was particularly fond of joining our four o'clock tea-table, and his exuberant boyish gaiety was very refreshing in our foggy island. His fellow-prisoner, Poerio, also came to us in London. He was very gentle and quiet, and never breathed a word against the iniquitous Government under which he had suffered so much. I think he only visited London once, but Lacaita was happily a permanent institution. He spoke English perfectly, with a slight accent which gave additional value to every word he said.

Another naturalized foreigner who added much to our cheerfulness was Count Strelecki. I think he first became well-known by his exertions in Skibbereen, in the year of the Irish famine. He was most entertaining. I once returned from Yorkshire in the same railway-carriage with him, and the journey seemed all too short, he told such lovely stories and made me laugh so heartily. One was of a lady alone in the train with a man whom she feared was mad, and her terror reached its height when he took out a knife and brandished it. She was relieved when he plunged his hand into another pocket and pulled out an orange. Another story he was fond of telling was of an old bachelor in the Albany, paralyzed, and lying in bed in charge of a nurse who, before his eyes, packed up all his valuables and prepared to run off with them ; but first she said, leaning over the bed :

‘ My dear, I must go ; but before we part I will give you one kiss.’

His way of telling these stories, his inimitable drollery, and funny English, and animated gestures, gave effect to what at second-hand may not appear amusing. He had beautifully white, thick hair, and once said to Mrs. Grote, who was very fond of young people :

‘ Mrs. Grote, I hear you are given over to de boys, but powder will come in, and de white hairs will have a chance.’

William Rathbone Greg, the author of the ‘ Creed of Christendom,’ ‘ Enigmas of Life,’ etc., was among the men who long survived my father, and whose friendship was greatly valued by him and afterwards by ourselves. He was eminently companionable and sympathetic. In later days there were few pleasanter things than to leave the heat and noise of London in the season and drive out to visit him and Mrs. Greg at Wimbledon, and find them sitting under the large tree on their lawn undisturbed by the busy world, yet interested in all that was going on.

It was at the Lewis’, at Harpton, that we first met Sir Charles Newton, then just come back from Mytilene, and thoroughly enjoying his return to civilization. He, and afterwards his accomplished wife, became great friends of ours. My father and Lady Newton took a great fancy to each other, and she made a very striking sketch of him in his last illness. She did not long survive him. The remembrance of their friendship drew Sir Charles and ourselves nearer together, and there was no more constant and welcome guest in Cornwall Gardens. I remember especially a small luncheon-party, where there were only Newton and Lowell besides our own party, and how agreeable it was.

There was an even greater sympathetic charm about Lowell, whose conversation, in no way depending upon persons or passing events, resembled in this respect that of Dean Stanley. Lowell had a great friend in London, Mrs. Smalley, and early on every Thursday afternoon he was to be found in her drawing-room. I often made one of a small circle collected there, listening to Lowell's delightful talk, too soon, alas! to cease for ever.

My father fully made up his mind to visit the United States in 1859: his passage was taken, and I was to have gone with him; but while he was at Ketteringham (Sir John Boileau's), where a large party was assembled to meet Guizot, he was attacked by a violent fit of sciatica which forced him to relinquish his trip across the Atlantic, and rush down to Malvern to be treated. He was cured almost at once by the douche.

We had a lively time at Malvern. Watts was there, and we met for the first time our charming and excellent friends the De Mussys. The Doctor was in attendance on Queen Marie Amélie. Mme. Mohl, who brought sunshine wherever she went, also came. My father soon was able to start on some visits in Scotland and Ireland. On the morning that he and my mother left we had all our friends to breakfast, and sat quite quietly talking until our servant Chivers, who lived with us twenty years, and was known to all who frequented Hyde Park Gate, put his head in at the door and said, 'The omnibus is ready'; whereupon the family departed without more ado, to Mme. Mohl's intense amusement.

Chivers was one of the cleverest men I ever knew. Besides his ordinary duties, which he performed admirably, he wrote for my father, was a capital courier, and organized all the material parts of our society. He married our cook, and became Gunter's right-hand man; but he never thought any family comparable to ours, and, contrary to the old saying, my father was certainly a hero to his valet-de-chambre.

One cannot help regretting the loss of an American journal. Almost all the Americans of distinction came to Hyde Park Gate. My earliest remembrance is of Daniel Webster. I have opposite to me at the present moment a small Parian bust of himself, which he gave to us when he left. He had a magnificent head and a powerful, rather stern, countenance. His wife was a very striking person, beautiful and dignified. We always knew the American Minister for the time being, and saw a great deal of him and his family. Prescott, Dana, Palfrey, the two Sumners, Mottley, Wheaton, Forbes, Winthrop, Seward, Bancroft, were among our frequent guests whenever they were on this side of the Atlantic, and with some of them my father kept up a correspondence.

Of all the distinguished people with whom it has been my good fortune to be thrown, there was not one in whose views, objects, and opinions I sympathized so entirely as with Arthur Stanley. He was too young to have been, as so many of my father's friends, such as Whately, Hampden, and others were, a frequent inmate in our old home, and I had not therefore the privilege of the daily intercourse which, more than any amount of meeting at parties, enables one to know a man's real character. But in Stanley there were no mysteries or contradictions. The most striking thing about him at first sight was his perfect simplicity and naturalness. The latter is a rare quality, for without any conscious vanity or affectation, there are few people who can absolutely divest themselves of shyness and gêne in their intercourse with others. He never seemed to think of himself at all; he was absorbed in the subject of which he was speaking and at the same time interested in the person he was speaking to. Almost everybody interested him, and he drew something worth having from people without any pretension to intellectual eminence; for conscious of his sympathy and appreciation, they gave him of their best, and became, if not brilliant talkers, at any rate ready listeners. His conversation was not, as Mme. Mohl used to say of many Londoners, a dilution of the Times of the day; you could not assign a date to it, for it was on matters of constant interest, not often on politics or persons. I heard him, however, say, in 1880, 'If

Gladstone gets in for Midlothian, England will have an absolute dictator.'

The Stanleys and ourselves had a common subject of interest in Jenny Lind, whose principal friends in England were the Grotes, Whatelys, and Stanleys. There was an amusing paragraph mixing them up together in a French newspaper which stated that 'Mlle. Lind was going to marry the nephew of Mr. Grote, Archbishop of Norwich.' It was a sad disappointment to the great singer when she found that her friend's son had absolutely no ear for music.

When one reads Stanley's vivid descriptions of scenery, it is difficult to believe that he was also colour-blind. He told me that what people call red looked to him just the same as slate-colour, and for him the palest cheek was the most beautiful. He was equally without taste or smell. He made up for all these deficiencies of sense by the warmth of his imagination and his heart. He cared little for art, his chief interest was in all sorts and conditions of life, and in all kinds of people. I once made to him the commonplace remark that the lives of kings and princes must be very dull.

'Oh no,' he said, 'their position is so interesting, both to themselves and others.'

It was this constant endeavour to understand other lives, added to his vivid imagination, that made him delight in history and travelling, and topography, which united the other two. Fiction was to him almost as real as history, and I remember his travelling, with Lady Augusta, all the way to Dunstable to visit the scene of Miss Edgeworth's story, 'The Basketmakers.'

Great was the joy of all his London friends when Stanley was appointed Dean of Westminster. He told us that when his predecessor hung the Order of the Bath round his neck, Archbishop Trench complained that it would not fit.

‘You see, you are so narrow, Stanley,’ he said.

‘Well, really,’ rejoined the new Dean, ‘I have always been accused of being too broad.’

Henceforth we saw him often. He was very kind in coming to see my father during his last illness, and when, after 1864, our old home was broken up, for it had lost its chief, we had another bond of union in our friendship with Julius and Mary Mohl. Ever since the early fifties, Mme. Mohl had been in the habit of enlivening us with her presence for a few days in every year; it was at her house in Paris that we first met Lady Augusta Bruce, long before the perfect marriage which Mme. Mohl was very proud of having helped to promote.

Stanley was as fortunate in his domestic relations as in the position he occupied. His parents, especially his mother, fostered the remarkable moral and intellectual nature which was further developed by his great master, Arnold. His sisters were devoted to him, and when his mother died, it was to make way for the crowning happiness of his life.

I asked his only surviving sister last year if she remembered (he was much older) anything that had not already been said of his early youth. She replied: ‘I principally recollect the delightful walks I used to take with him in early days. He would go out in all weathers. It was a necessity to him to have two hours' exercise every day, and whether it was pouring a deluge or blowing a hurricane out he must go, and I with him, because he could not walk without a companion. On starting on these excursions he used to say, "Now, which shall it be? An historical walk, or a geographical, or an arithmetical walk?" One of these three it always was. Some epoch in modern or ancient history was set, as it were, on the table and dissected, or else the geography of some particular country; and now and then, though not often, arithmetic, the multiplication table and addition, never beyond these regions, and many a pause ensued after "5 times 7" or "8 times 4." They were to me hours of the deepest enchantment.'

To those who did not know him, this description may savour of priggishness, but Stanley's perfect simplicity and indifference to effect prevented his ever giving this impression. No place, no position in the world, would have suited him so well as the Deanery of Westminster, and the Canonry of Canterbury led up to it, and no one who has once enjoyed, as I did frequently, the privilege of going round the Abbey with him will ever forget it. He would turn to me and say, 'Now I know you want to see the wax figures'—those gruesome relics of a past age which used to be carried at the funerals of Royal and distinguished people, and he also never failed to point out the skin of the malefactor who tried to steal the pyx, still clinging to the door of the closet in which it was kept.

On one occasion I met there the black King Bonney and his suite. All manner of fine and learned folks, as well as artizans of all kinds, joined these parties, and always some children, Lady Augusta often carrying a little one round on her shoulder. She, as well as the Dean, was passionately fond of children, and mine, as well as others, were always invited to the window-gardening parties and to tea afterwards at the Deanery. Once—I believe it was the last time that Lord Shaftesbury was equal to the effort—we heard him speak and deliver the prizes.

No hostess ever did the honours with more grace than did Lady Augusta at the Deanery to gentle and simple. It was the grace of exquisite tact, combined with real kindness of heart. Mme. Mohl wrote to her in 1870: 'I had rather be with you than at the Royal board, and it is but honest to confess it. I just tell you what I feel about the Abbey; but it's no wonder when queens throng to it to meet the learned.'

It was in this year that Mme. Mohl spent the greater part of the winter with us in Cornwall Gardens in consequence of the Franco-German war. Among the first to cheer her in her exile were the Dean and Lady Augusta, and besides frequently coming over in the afternoon, they often dined with us to meet one or two other intimate friends. M. Mohl, who was staying with Lady William Russell and Mme. Schwabe, always made one at these little dinners. On one occasion the Stanleys brought Père Hyacinthe, for whom the Dean had a great regard.

It was no passion for notoriety that induced him to seek the acquaintance of conspicuous people. It was a real interest, a wish to find points of agreement in those whose opinions seemed most dissimilar, and also his strong feeling that conduct, not opinion, is the great test of character. I heard him once say to someone who objected to the Communion Service, that it did people good to be reminded once a year that it was of far more importance to obey the laws of God than to hold certain opinions. Although absolutely without self-assertion, he never flinched from expressing his own opinions. He demanded from others the tolerance which he exercised towards them. One evening, in the midst of fiery meetings in Convocation, in which Stanley came into collision with the High Church party, there was a large party at the Deanery, and I happened to say something about Archdeacon Denison, on which the Dean laughingly brought him up and introduced him to me. They were evidently on excellent terms, and chaffed each other with the utmost good humour.

There was one interesting function at which we used always to meet the Dean and Lady Augusta—a dinner which was given every year by Mrs. Bayne, a cousin of Thackeray's, and a very clever lady,* to celebrate her great friend Bishop Thirlwall's birthday. The Bishop was, of course, always there. It was on February 9, and there were nine guests, and nine dishes, and nine sorts of wine, and most agreeable company. On one of these occasions, when there was some talk about the doings in Queen Anne's day, the Dean whispered to his next neighbour, with a look at his wife, 'There is our Mrs. Masham.'

Lady Augusta seemed the personification of health and strength. Besides her enormous social and philanthropic labours, she took long walks with her husband in the afternoons. One constantly came upon them trudging along tête-à-tête ever so far from home. Still more often were they cheering the sick and poor in the slums of Westminster; and Lady Augusta's powers of organization were put to the test by the various meetings and ceremonies in the Abbey. I remember the immense pains she took in getting up the 'Passions-musik.'

* It is a great pity that Mrs. Bayne's 'Memorials of the Thackeray Family,' printed for private circulation, are not given to the world.

The Dean had no taste for details, and no care for comfort. He took no heed of what he ate or drank, or wherewithal he was clothed. His wife had to look after him as if he had been a child. His idea of relaxation in the autumn was chiefly travelling. He liked being on the spot where any soul-stirring event had happened or was happening, and Lady Augusta never let him go alone. She seemed, like him, indefatigable. But the continuous strain proved in the end too much for her. The long journey to Russia in 1874, the fêtes in honour of the Duke of Edinburgh's marriage, when she represented the Queen, and the following London season, during which she was in constant attendance on the Duchess, fatigued her extremely, and in the autumn the Stanleys' so-called holiday was spent in visiting old châteaux and cathedrals in France. When they reached Mme. Mohl's hospitable apartment on their way back, Lady Augusta suddenly broke down, and it was many weeks before she could be moved. She never walked again. I saw her two or three times during the painful illness which ensued, and was struck by the spiritual beauty of her face. Her large black eyes seemed more lustrous than ever, contrasted with the snowy whiteness of her hair.

I was one of the many friends present at her funeral, and I shall never forget the deep grief stamped on her husband's countenance as, leading one of her little nephews in each hand, he followed her coffin to its resting-place in Henry VII.'s Chapel.

For Stanley the glory of life had departed; he never entirely recovered from the blow, but he did not give way to selfish absorption in the past. He gathered up the fragments of life, he worked harder than ever, and still enjoyed the society of his old friends. He often came to dine with us, and I remember his telling the ghost story of 'Ticonderoga' (published afterwards in Macmillan's Magazine) at our table with thrilling effect. On another occasion we were expecting Mrs. Craven, and we waited for nearly an hour and no Mrs. Craven appeared, but the usual chill did not fall on the company, for Stanley's brilliant and easy talk made us all forget that we were hungry and weary. In justice to that charming and distinguished lady, I must add that when she arrived she told us that she had been driven all about the town by a stupid cabman.

In April, 1880, he met at our house Renan, and the two got on capitally, in spite of the difference of language. But the Dean's French, although unidiomatic and ill-pronounced, was very fluent, and that is all that matters.

His handwriting was curiously illegible. On one occasion a letter he wrote to the Archbishop of Dublin was sent to Bath ; and on another, when he was engaged to dine with the Rector of St. Martin's in the Fields, they waited and waited—no Dean of Westminster. At length they went in to dinner, and the evening passed without any sign of life from him, nor did any excuse arrive next day. His host, feeling alarmed lest any evil should have befallen him, wrote to him to inquire the reason of his absence. Back came a letter of the deepest apology, to say that, having set down his engagement in his memorandum-book, he looked at it on the appointed day, but no power under the sun could enable him to decipher his own writing, and he found it impossible to make out either the name or the address of his intended host, so that he could neither fulfil his engagement nor even send an excuse.

In the year 1880 we took a house for the summer at Canterbury, and I asked the Dean for some introductions. He gave me his visiting-card, with the names of the residents in the precincts scribbled on it on one side, and on the other, 'Pray show every attention to Mrs. Simpson, Nassau Senior's daughter.' We wondered to whom we should send it, so we went to the service in the Cathedral and looked at all the canons as they marched out. Canon Robertson especially took our fancy, and we left the card at his house with one of our own. The next day he came up the hill to call on us. 'You have no idea,' he said, 'what a bomb you threw into the precincts! We could not decipher the writing.'

All the Dean's friends were very kind to us, and we enjoyed their society exceedingly. We went over the Cathedral with almost every one of them. Mrs. Rawlinson was also an excellent guide. We used to have lawn-tennis in our garden every Wednesday, and these distinguished ecclesiastics did not despise sharing in the game. Canon Rawlinson was especially keen at it.

In the following June Canon Robertson dined with us, and Stanley came to meet him, and was as delightful as ever. A few weeks later I saw him for the last time. It was at one of the Westminster flower-shows. He had been talking to Sir George Baden-Powell, and after his companion left him I noticed that the Dean was standing alone in the middle of the gravel-walk, apparently in a dream, and with the same look of deep grief in his face that struck me when he followed his wife to the grave.

A fortnight later he was laid beside her.

CHAPTER XI.

LATER FRIENDS IN PARIS.

AFTER 1857, when he visited Constantinople and Greece, my father's days of distant travelling were over ; but he continued to visit France once or twice a year. A younger generation had grown up in 1860 ; many who before the Empire would have been politicians had turned to literature as the only career open to them. They used to find great relief in expressing their opinions of the coup d'état and its consequences to my father, to be duly recorded, as they knew, in his journals,* consequently he never would be introduced to the Emperor, and although we were once asked to a ball at the Tuileries he refused to go there. My mother and I were mean enough to sneak in under the wing of Prosper Mérimée, the Empress' secretary. It was a splendid sight. The Emperor looked like a sick parrot—he seemed cold and bored ; but the Empress was graceful and charming. We slipped out without being presented, glad to have seen the sight ; but it was not a bit more beautiful than a ball at Buckingham Palace.

* 'Journals in France and Italy,' published in 1871 ; 'Conversations and Correspondence with Tocqueville,' 1872 ; 'Conversations with Thiers, Guizot, etc.,' in 1878 ; 'Conversations with Distinguished Persons,' in 1880.

Prosper Mérimée was one of the few Imperialists we knew; it was not so much political feeling as friendship for the Empress, whom he had known from a child, which attached him to the Court. He affected the flegme Britannique, in which he was assisted by his appearance. Tall, rather gaunt, studiously quiet in voice and manner, stately and good-looking, he was much more like an Englishman than a Frenchman. But there the resemblance ended; the turn of his mind, his cynical esprit, were essentially French. He had, however, a way of saying the most startling, caustic things in his calm, gentle voice that reminded us of Kinglake: it was only after a moment's reflection that it occurred to his hearers how pointed and amusing his paradoxes were. Some people never found it out at all, and wondered why Mérimée was considered so entertaining.

In his youth he had been a great lady-killer. Mme. Mohl used to relate how he appeared one day with his arm in a sling, and she found out that he had been fighting a duel with an infuriated husband, who had discovered a letter from Mérimée to his wife, and who, as Mérimée said, 'n'aimait pas ma prose.' Tocqueville used to tell us how handsome he had been in youth, 'with flaxen hair curling to his shoulders.' He had a genius for friendship as well as for love-making, as the numerous letters, published since his death, to his female friends attest. In his latter days he was obliged to spend the winter at Cannes, where two old English ladies used to trot after him, carrying his stool and sketching materials. He was a beautiful artist, and copied in oil-miniatures the fine pictures in almost all the European galleries. When we were in Paris, we used to go to drink thé jaune, which was sent to him from Russia, in his rooms in the Rue de Lille, and he was more charming than ever in his character as host, showing us all sorts of interesting and beautiful things, and introducing us to his wonderful cat, his great companion. We never met anyone there but the Mohls. He would also take us to St. Germain and Versailles, and was an excellent showman. He pointed out to us the curious changes of fashion in beauty as shown in the galleries of Versailles, where the portraits are grouped according to date. In the reign of Louis XIV. the women's faces were round, and they lengthened gradually during the next two reigns, until later on a long chin was considered attractive.

Another of our friends was Victor Cousin, who was deeply in love with the ladies of the seventeenth century, especially Mme. de Longueville. He used to come and talk to us of them by the hour, to my great delight, for I was already fairly well read in the memoirs of those times. I like them best in the original form, but they are admirably boiled down in Cousin's books. He was a brilliant talker, very excitable; no British calm was there. He was intensely French, and in 1862 came over to England only to see Poussin's pictures. We went with him to the Dulwich Gallery for that purpose, and he did not care to look at any of the other masterpieces. He was tall and bulky and very pale, and looked much older than he really was, as is generally the case with learned Frenchmen, the consequence of their despising air and exercise.

Michel Chevalier had been a friend of my father's ever since we first went to Carlsbad, in 1840. He was a very agreeable man, and we saw a great deal of him, both in London and Paris. I remember meeting him one day at his brother's, Auguste Chevalier;* Mignet, Cousin, Prévost Paradol, Prosper Mérimée were also there, and I was looking forward to a rich conversational treat. But, alas! these accomplished talkers chose 'Château d'Yquem' for their subject, and no other was mentioned throughout dinner.

Mignet was delightful, extremely handsome; his blue eyes retained their fire to the last; he had not the extreme excitability of Cousin or the flegme of Mérimée. He never seemed to listen to a word one said, yet one felt one's vanity satisfied, for he took so much pains to please the person he selected to listen to him. In Mme. Mohl's last days he was one of her most constant friends and visitors. One evening he was holding forth in praise of Henri IV., with his usual absorption in his subject. At last Mme. Mohl got quite tired and tapped his shoulder, exclaiming, 'Assez, mon cher, vous prêchez une convertie.'

In those days Prévost Paradol was just rising into fame; he was still quite young, and very handsome and agreeable. He looked like a hero of romance. His was, indeed, a tragical and romantic story. Like most of the literary men of that period, he was a staunch Orleanist until 1870, when he believed in

* Secretary to Louis Napoleon until the coup d'état.

Louis Napoleon's promise of 'crowning the edifice' by establishing a Liberal Government under Ollivier, from whom Prévost Paradol accepted the post of French Minister at Washington. Bitterly disappointed by the course of events, and filled with regret at having forsaken his colours and forming part of a Government which he felt had betrayed his country, he committed suicide not long after he reached his post.

Jules Simon was one of my father's intimate friends. The state of the poor was a subject of absorbing interest to them both, and when we were in Paris he used to take my father to see artizans and other republicans, which gave an interesting variety to the Journals.* Years afterwards, in 1877, when Jules Simon was Minister of the Interior, he asked my daughter and me to visit him at the 'Ministère,' as he was too much overwhelmed with work to go out. His cares did not sit lightly upon him, although he gave us a very long audience, and talked most agreeably in his low, sweet voice. When we rose up to go, he thanked us for our kindness in visiting 'le malheureux qui habite ce cabinet.'

A very interesting, kind, and constant friend to us all was Adolphe Comte de Circourt. He was not a bigoted Orleanist, and in Louis Napoleon's early days was French Ambassador at Berlin, but he retired after the coup d'état. He was full of the most accurate and varied information. Tocqueville said of him :

'Circourt is my dictionary ; when I want to know

* Published in 1880 ; but, as M. Simon was alive at that time, he appears under the initials ' D. E. F. '

what has been done or said on any occasion I go to Circourt. He draws out one of the drawers in his capacious head, and finds there all I want, arranged and ticketed. One of the merits of his talk, as it is of his character, is its conscientiousness. He has the truthfulness of a thorough gentleman, and his affections are as strong as his hatreds. I do not believe he would sacrifice a friend even to a good story, and where is there another man of whom that can be said ?

M. de Circourt spoke English, Russian, and German with perfect ease. I could only judge of his English, which was extremely fluent and perfectly intelligible. He never stopped for a word, but his idioms were sometimes very droll. One afternoon he came in and said :

‘ I was to-day at an artist’s of my friends. A negress was sitting to him, and I tasted her conversation and her moral for the space of two hours, and found them quite equal to those of a white.’

He said once to Matthew Arnold, of some friend, that ‘ he was very unconventional, but never walked out of the conveniences.’ He began public life as secretary to Prince Polignac. The revolution of 1830 destroyed his prospects, and he retired to Geneva, where he met and married Mlle. de Klustyn, the distinguished Russian lady whose salon was one of the last and best in Paris. It was extremely amusing, and we frequented it assiduously. People of all countries and varieties and opinions were to be found there, for although both she and her husband were Legitimists, as a foreigner she had not the strong enmity against the Usurper felt by the Orleanist and Conservative parties. Her hours of reception were :

Mondays	4 to 6 p.m.
Tuesdays	9 to 12 „
Wednesdays	4 to 6 „
Thursdays	2 to 6 „
Fridays	4 to 6 „
Saturdays	4 to 6 „

On Tuesday evenings her rooms were crowded. My father once complained of the impossibility of approaching her. 'There is a little narrow path between the chairs,' she replied, 'through which the habitués of my salon can generally manage to reach me ; but the day before yesterday it was difficult to thread, and it lasted so till two in the morning.'

It is curious that of the ladies I saw most in Paris scarcely one was really French. Mme. de Circourt was a Muscovite ; Mme. Faucher was Polish ; Mme. de Tocqueville, Mme. Mohl, Mme. de Peyronnet, Mme. de Bury, Mme. de Lamartine, and Mme. du Quaire were English. Of the really French there was none more charming than Mme. Anisson du Perron, and long after the days of which I am writing my daughter and I dined with her in Paris when she was ninety-three. She died only a short time ago.

Paris is the Paradise of old ladies. There is (or was in my day) no need to dress smartly and go to parties in order to see people, and the older a woman grows the more her children and friends surround her. The day we dined with Mme. Anisson her son and daughter-in-law took all trouble off her hands, and in the evening other children and grandchildren and intimate friends flocked in, some to show their dresses on the way to a ball, others after the play to finish their evening and to tell the old lady all that they were doing. As I have said before, friendships are stronger abroad than at home. The Circourts had an intimate friend, M. de B., who was devoted to them both; his weakness was that he was always thinking about his health. When Mme. de Circourt died, in consequence of setting herself on fire, and after years of suffering borne with great courage and patience, M. de B. was in despair. Mme. du Quaire went to condole with him, but after a paroxysm of grief he brightened up and exclaimed, 'Mais, savez vous, que toutes ces émotions là m'ont fait du bien.' He devoted himself for the rest of his life to M. de Circourt, who in turn, towards the end of his days, found a devoted friend in the young, beautiful, and gifted Duchess Colonna. She was a Swiss lady by birth—Mlle. d'Affre—and had known him from her earliest years.

Mme. de Circourt was a brilliant talker, but her conversation was somewhat artificial. There was no formality in her receptions; this was not the case in some purely French houses, where the ladies were often arranged in two opposite lines on each side of the fireplace with the hostess at the top, like the passengers in a railway carriage, or an avenue of sphinxes. The hostess left her place and bustled down the room to meet each new-comer, and when she wished to treat her with especial honour was wont to put her between herself and the fire, so that no conversation was possible. The men wandered outside the avenue, and in and out of the rooms, like souls in purgatory, apparently without object. This was always the arrangement in the official receptions, and nothing could be duller than they were. On the other hand, there was no crowd, and every woman had a seat, but only one who had the toupet of Mme. Mohl ever ventured to break the rule in other people's houses, and collect round her a little circle of her own.

There were, of course, some exceptions; at Duvergier de Hauranne's one might sit where one pleased, and talk to whomsoever one liked, and at Mme. Duchâtel's I did not wish to move, for on the Fridays in Lent she had the most delicious music: some of the artists from the Conservatoire used to come to play in one of the rooms, where we all sat quiet, without a word being spoken. There were other rooms where people might talk as much as they liked without disturbing the melomaniacs.

I enjoyed no parties so much in Paris as the little dinners. The dining-room in a French apartment is generally so small—not much bigger than the oval table—that only a few people can dine in it, which is an advantage when you have guests with the powers of conversation possessed by French people, and powers of listening also. There is nothing so pleasant as a sympathetic listener except a brilliant talker; but a small party, where two or three conversations in a low tone are going on at once and across, is distracting in the extreme. The French have tact enough to see this. We did not give dinners ourselves in Paris, as we lived in a hotel, but we had constant breakfast parties, when it was even more easy to promote general conversation.

Tocqueville said, in one of his conversations, 'Le grand talent pour le silence, or, in other words, the power of listening, is a great conversational virtue.' I do not believe that it was said ironically or epigrammatically. The man who bestowed that praise knew how rare a merit silence is.

'We had two pleasant breakfasts,' my father replied, 'a fortnight ago. You were leader of the band at one, and Guizot at the other, and the rest left the stage free to the great actors. A great talker, Montalembert, is to breakfast with us. Whom shall I ask to meet him?'

'Not me,' replied Tocqueville, 'unless you will accept me as part of the chorus. I will not take a premier rôle in a piece in which he is to act. I like his society—that is, I like to sit silent and hear him talk, and I admire his talents; and we have the strong bond of common hatred, though perhaps we hate on different or even opposite grounds, and I do not wish for a dispute with him, of which, if I say anything, I shall be in danger. If we differed on only one subject instead of differing, as we do, on all but one, he would pick out that single subject to attack me on. I am not sure that even as host you will be safe. He is more acute in detecting points of opposition than most men are in finding subjects of agreement. He avoids meeting you on friendly or even on neutral ground. He chooses to have a combat en champ clos. Take care,' he added, 'not to have too many sommités. They watch one another, are conscious that they are watched, and a coldness creeps over the table.'

I have quoted the above because I cannot speak in any but general terms of Montalembert's remarkable conversation. I found it delightful to listen to him, and his frank, cordial manner, pleasant voice, and beautiful English, added much to the charm.

Some dear old friends of the Seniors, the Miss Nihells, Irish ladies, lived for many years in Paris. I was particularly fond of the younger, Miss Alice, with whom (they were ardent Roman Catholics) I used to go about to the churches to hear all the great preachers. Even when no celebrated ecclesiastic occupied the pulpit I never heard a dull sermon. In the Roman Catholic Church the priest is not supposed, as with us, to unite all the talents and virtues, to be a constant, welcome, and discriminating visitor of the poor as well as a fine preacher, and nowadays to be an excellent musician and possess a good voice. There are regular preaching Orders, as everyone knows, in the Papal Church, who go about and preach for a certain period, such as Lent, or Easter. One day the Père Gratry was announced to preach at St. Clotilde. We went to hear him, and I was much disappointed when a quite young man appeared in his stead in the pulpit. But the first few sentences in the preacher's musical voice dispelled my regret. It was an excellent sermon on the Christian virtues of sweetness, gentleness, forbearance, etc., as shown in the life of Queen Clotilde, who converted her husband to Christianity. The manner was as attractive as the matter. 'Who is he?' I whispered, and Miss Nihell replied, 'The Abbé Perreyve.' I had heard Tocqueville, whose great friend he was, speak of him, and was very glad when my companion offered to take me to see him.

He lived in a little back street near the church, in a most miserable lodging, smelling of drains. It needed all the charming qualities of the Abbé Perreyve to make our visit endurable. I never saw him again, for he died quite early—no wonder, considering his delicate frame and unhealthy conditions of life.

Another time Alice Nihell took me to the Sacré Cœur. The nuns occupy the Hotel Biron, once the palace of Mme. de la Vallière, and the walls and ceilings and doors were still (in the early sixties) adorned with charming little groups of nymphs and Cupids. The lofty rooms, looking so pure and clean, with their waxed floors and little white beds, and the large playground, spoke well for the healthiness of the establishment; as to the teaching, opinions differed. After going over the house we were shown into the parlour, where we were joined by the Superior, Mme. Davidoff, celebrated for her power of converting. Mr. Augustus Hare tells her romantic story,* and does full justice to her charm of manner and extraordinary eloquence. It was wasted upon me, for when I told her that I considered the Church of England, to which I belonged, the best Church in the world, but that I did not believe in any visible infallible Church, she gave me up. Once again I went to see her with Louisa Lady Ashburton, but we were both proof against her arguments.

The only great Roman Catholic service that ever satisfied me as religious without being theatrical was the Good Friday service at Nôtre Dame. The cathedral looked grand in the thin light of evening; a few wax tapers here and there made it appear of vast extent. The whole body of the church was filled with men. In the chancel were the priests and choristers, singing the 'Miserere,' unaccompanied by the organ; the alternate verses were chanted by the bass voices of the congregation. All was grand and serious. With the exception of this service, our own cathedral service is far more impressive; to my Protestant feelings it seems more real.

* In the 'Story of my Life,' vol. ii., p. 63.

We used to enjoy very much our visits to French country houses. In those days (I know nothing of France since 1887) the French did not use their country houses, as so many do in England, for the purposes of society. They collected round them their children and grandchildren, did not wear fine clothes, and lived a simple country life.

Our visit to the Guizots in 1860 I have already described.*

From Valricher we visited the Kergorlays, in their splendid old château, Canisy, between Coutances and St. Lô. It came into the family through a Mlle. de Faudoas, who married a Count Kergorlay just before the great Revolution. They went off for a honeymoon in 1789, and were not able to return until 1802. Meanwhile M. de Faudoas and his unmarried daughter remained in the Castle. They were popular, took no part in politics, and were long unmolested. In a letter to a young friend she had the imprudence to say, 'Ma chienne vient de mettre au monde quatre petits citoyens.' The letter was opened at the Paris Post Office, she and her father were accused of 'incivisme,' carried to Paris, and guillotined. Her portrait, that of a merry, pretty girl of eighteen with a bright, gay expression, hung on the wall of the drawing-room.

* See p. 71.

The most modern part of the castle belongs to the beginning of the sixteenth century, the oldest to the eleventh. The east front is 650 feet long, the south about 300. In 1860 it stood much in need of repair; but it can never look so striking as in its picturesque decay, the walls covered with ivy and lichen, which was all to be destroyed when the work of restoration began.

The heroine of 'Northanger Abbey' would have delighted in it in our day. My father and I were lodged in enormous rooms, scantily furnished, and looking out on the lake. It made me think of Lochleven, and fancy myself an unwilling prisoner. The windows did not fasten, and there were wide spaces under the doors through which, when night came, the wind howled and bats flew in, seeking the warmth and light of our fires, for it was a wet summer, and we were glad when our old servant Chivers came in with logs of wood to light them. But here the romance ended. We were most cordially received by host and hostess, and enjoyed our visit very much, driving to the many interesting spots—Mont St. Michel, Coutances, St. Lô—in the neighbourhood. One night the notables came to dinner. They were not amusing, for their discourse turned almost entirely on local subjects. I was ashamed of my father, who took up a book. We came in for the Ember Days, and were supposed to fast, but never did I see such luxurious dinners. One would die of dyspepsia if one fasted every day. Our hosts were strict Catholics and Legitimists, although in a weak moment M. de Kergorlay, who was an hereditary 'Pair de France,' accepted a seat in the Senate of the Empire, for which he was much blamed by his Royalist friends.

From Canisy we went to the Corcelles at Beau Fossé, near Chartres. On the way we visited the Cathedral, admired the painted windows, and wondered at the miraculous black Virgin.

M. de Corcelle was a great friend of ours. We used to see him almost every day in Paris, and he was one of the survivors of the old set who were so kind to me in after years. He and I used to take a fiacre and start, guide-book in hand, to visit all the old purlieus and places of historical interest in Paris—the site of the 'Marais,' where all the best society of the Ancien Régime collected in the Hotel Rambouillet, and so much wit sparkled and good sense was talked as atoned for the affectation immortalised by Molière; the Hotel Carnavalet, the abode of Mme. de Sévigné, which, fortunately, has been preserved as a museum; and, most picturesque of all, the Place Royale, an old brick square planted with trees—from the window of one of its palaces Mme. de Longueville is said to have looked out calmly on the duel between her two lovers; the Val de Grâce, where Louise de la Fayette sought refuge from her royal lover, and Anne of Austria retired to rest from her numberless intrigues and to devise new ones, while Mme. de Chevreuse rode to and fro in the habit of a dashing cavalier; or, to speak of times nearer to our own, the pillars on the site of the Bastille, the conciergerie, and the wide street of the Faubourg St. Antoine, along which rattled the horrible tumbrils which dragged so many hundred victims to the guillotine.

M. de Corcelle shared the opinions of Tocqueville until 1848; afterwards his ardent Catholicism drew him nearer to Montalembert. He was twice Ambassador to the Vatican, in 1849 for some years, and again after 1870. Pius IX. was his intimate friend, and tried to persuade him to remain in Rome as his own Minister. The busts and pictures of the beautiful old Pope smiled down upon us from the walls of the château, and likewise from those of the Corcelles' apartment in the Rue de Bourgogne. Mme. de Corcelle was a grand-daughter of Lafayette. As at Val Richer and Canisy, there were no visitors except ourselves and their daughter and son-in-law—M. and Mme. de Chambrun. After dinner on the day of our arrival, I said casually how much I should like to see the baby, whereupon M. de Chambrun left the room and shortly reappeared with the little creature, bound to a piece of wood (emmaillotté, as it is called in France) in his arms. The practice is very convenient for the nurses, and the baby did not seem to mind it.

The Marquis de Chambrun had afterwards a strange career. He lost money, and emigrated with his family to America, where, although when I knew him in Paris he could not speak English, he went to the Bar and succeeded as an advocate. He died a few years ago, whereupon his wife and daughter came back to Paris to cheer the declining years of her parents, M. and Mme. de Corcelle, now, alas!

also gone to join the majority. Mlle. de Chambrun (the baby) married M. de Brazza, the famous African traveller.

M. de Tocqueville was a great friend of both families, and was very proud of having promoted the marriage of the Chambruns. Young men in France do not resent the interference of older persons in their matrimonial affairs, and there is much to be said in favour of the Continental plan. For instance, a girl is in a much more dignified position than she often is in England, where she may be accused of trying to 'catch a husband,' and a mother of 'manœuvring' if she wishes to obtain a suitable marriage for her daughter. But there is something in the foreign plan which strikes us as curious, even if we acknowledge its advantages. One day that M. de Corcelle was calling on me in Paris I observed that he seemed restless, and kept on looking at the clock. I asked him the reason, and he replied that he had a rendezvous with his niece, that they were going to the Jardin des Plantes, and before the lions' cage they were to see a gentleman who proposed to marry her. They had never met, and she was to look at him and decide if she would like him to pay his addresses to her. After this, she might draw back, but the suitor might not. A man cannot flirt with a girl through a whole season and go off and forget her at the end. The young people have not much opportunity of knowing each other even after they are engaged, for they must never be left alone for an instant. I remember once when we were in Paris Mme. Mohl was very much put out by her charming neighbour on the next floor, Mme. d'Abbadie, who could not bestow as much time as usual on her old friend because she was mounting guard over a pair of 'amoureux.' The girl was her niece, and was staying with her, and she was obliged to be present whenever the 'Monsieur' came to call. 'Les amoureux' were a perfect pest, for Mme. d'Abbadie would jump up in the middle of a sentence if she heard the bell, leaving the conversation at the most interesting point.

From Beau Fossé we went to Duvergier de Hauveranne's at Héry, near Bourges, in the heart of the Berri, a country which has been celebrated and idealized by Georges Sand. Here we found a brilliant circle. Perhaps the most remarkable member was General Changarnier, distinguished in the Spanish War of 1823, afterwards (1847) in Algeria, where he was General-in-Chief until he returned to Paris to put down the insurgents in 1848. He supported Louis Napoleon until the coup d'état, when the Emperor sent him to Vincennes. After his release he was exiled to Malines, and had not long returned when we met him at Héry.* He was tall and distinguished in appearance, a devoted squire of dames and extremely well dressed. Odillon Barrot was another well-known guest. He took an active part in promoting the Revolution of July, 1830; but Louis Philippe was not sufficiently

* In 1870 Changarnier again put his sword at the disposal of the Emperor. He was shut up in Metz with Bazaine, and endeavoured to obtain a free passage for the army to Algeria. It was refused, and Changarnier was taken prisoner. After the peace he returned to France, was elected Member of the Assembly, gave his constant support to Thiers, and helped him with advice regarding the organization of the army. He died in 1877.

Liberal for him. He became a member of the 'Gauche,' and joined Thiers against Guizot. For a few hours he was Prime Minister in 1848, and received the portfolio of Justice. He was tall, strong, and rosy, and looked more like a substantial farmer than a politician. His manner was frank and genial, and he was a delightful converser. Lanjuinais, son of the well-known member of the Convention and President of the Chamber in 1815, and M. and Mme. Target, M. Duvergier's daughter and son-in-law, the young men of the house and their friends, completed the circle.

Our host was not less distinguished than his guests. Ever since 1824, when he edited the Globe in conjunction with Guizot and Rémusat, he was a warm supporter of the Liberal party. He forsook Guizot for Thiers in 1840, when the former encouraged the reactionary policy of Louis Philippe, and he was the chief promoter of the political banquets which had a great share in overturning the throne. After the Revolution he was elected member of the Constituent Assembly, and afterwards of the Corps Législatif until the coup d'état, when he was imprisoned with the other victims of tyranny until January 9, 1852. From that time he gave up politics, and devoted himself to his 'Histoire Parlementaire de la France,' an excellent and valuable book.

The men of the party collected in M. Duvergier's study for conversation an hour or two before the eleven o'clock breakfast. In the afternoon I used to join the walking party in the Park, which was situated on the banks of the Loire, large and well-wooded. I remember one walk especially, during which Changarnier gave us an account of his share in the events of 1849 to 1851.*

M. Forgues, a writer in the Revue des deux Mondes, and M. Chambol, editor of the Siècle, joined the house-party on September 21, and some of the neighbours came to dinner. Among them M. and Mme. Bénéist d'Azy (she was the handsomest Frenchwoman I have ever seen), and the Marquis de Vogüé, a large proprietor and iron-master in the Berri. He had at different times taken an active part in politics, but after the coup d'état retired to his estates.†

M. Duvergier's principal farmer, M. Vaillant, dined at the château. He was a man of large capital and intelligence. His rent amounted to £800 a year, and he employed a capital of £6,000. We visited his farm, and as at Tocqueville, when we went to see M. Roussel, were struck by the poorness and slovenliness of his dwelling. There were beds in the sitting-room, and his wife was not much superior in manners and appearance to a peasant.

On our way back to Paris we visited the magnificent cathedral of Bourges and the interesting house of Jacques Cœur; in 1860 it was used as a Hôtel de Ville. Although September was nearly over, there were a great many of our friends in Paris, and we passed the time very pleasantly with Mme. Mohl, Prosper Mérimée, Cousin, Loménie, General Fénélon, Marshal Randon, the Minister of War, and others. M. de

* Published in 'Conversations during the Second Empire,' by Hurst and Blackett, in 1880. My father lent his journal to Kinglake, who, with my father's full consent, borrowed largely from it.

† He emerged again after the siege of Paris, in 1871.

Loménie was a brilliant talker, full of fun and good stories. He was the author of the 'Memoirs of Beaumarchais,' a frequent contributor to the Revue des deux Mondes, Professor of Literature in the Collège de France, and an Academician. He was, perhaps, even more mercurial than Ampère, whom we had the pleasure of meeting again in the splendid castle of Stors, built by Mansard for the Prince de Conti, and tenanted by M. and Mme. Chevreux. We found there also the Léon Says and the Abbé Gratry, a great preacher and liberal ecclesiastic, and passed a most agreeable day. Two other days we spent at Amblainvilliers, a villa near Paris, belonging to Drouyn de Lhuys, one of our most agreeable friends, devoted to English literature and speaking perfect English. We were much amused when we arrived and rang the bell to see the men-servants sitting round a table in the vestibule playing at cards. They just left their cards to open the door and announce us, and then returned to their game—quite openly, it was a thing of course. The Circourts likewise had their villa (Les Bruyères), where we visited them, in the forest of La Celle, halfway between Versailles and St. Germain. Their house was close to the château of La Celle, formerly the residence of Mme. de Pompadour, and on a neighbouring hill was the château of Mme. de Beauregard,* another royal favourite, with the National flag flying over it, to the great scandal of the neighbours.

Mme. Cornu, to whom Mme. Mohl had introduced us in 1858, was likewise in Paris at this time. She was the foster-sister of Louis Napoleon, had been brought up with him, and they were greatly attached to each other. She was an uncommonly clever woman, and she wrote for him a great part of his book on artillery practice, when he was a prisoner at Ham, and continued to see him daily when he returned to Paris until the coup d'état in 1852. She was taken by surprise when that occurred, and broke with him entirely. He was deeply grieved, and sent the Grand Duchess Stéphanie to persuade her to relent.

* Mrs. Howard, mistress, until his marriage, of Louis Napoleon.

'Tell him,' replied Mme. Cornu, 'that the gipsy's prophecy that he would rise to the highest eminence of power and fame, and would be killed by a bullet, will come true.'

The Grand Duchess delivered the message.

'Nothing is more probable,' he replied.

We saw Mme. Cornu frequently whenever we were in Paris, and her conversations with my father form some of the most curious pages in his journals.* No one knew Louis Napoleon so well as she did, and she talked of him without reserve. She said that he was a man of strong passions kept under severe control; that imagination was his predominant faculty, and that he lived chiefly in the future, and had no moral sense whatever. He never forgot a benefit, or an injury, or an early friend. He never ceased to make advances to reconciliation with Mme. Cornu, wrote to her constantly, consulted her about his 'Vie de César,' and sent her messages on the 'Jour de l'an.' We thought we discerned a tendency towards forgiveness on her side, and when we went to Paris in April, 1863, my father told her so.

* 'Conversations with Thiers, Guizot, etc.,' vol. ii. ; 'Conversations with Distinguished Persons under the Empire,' vols. i. and ii., passim.

‘At last you are right,’ she replied. ‘On the 5th of last month he wrote to me to say that for twelve years I had refused to see him, and that perhaps I should persist, but that he could not bear the thought that he might die before I had embraced his child; that the next day his boy would be seven years old; that Mme. Walewska would call on me at 1.0 on that day, and that he could not avoid indulging a hope that I would allow her to take me to the Tuileries. I could not refuse.

‘The next day she came and took me thither. As we entered his cabinet the door was closed, and I found myself in the presence of the Emperor and Empress. She was the nearest, and took me by the hand. He stood still for an instant, then ran forward, took me by the arm, threw himself on my neck and kissed me. I kissed him, and we all of us, including the Empress and Mme. Walewska, began to weep.

“Méchante femme,” exclaimed the Emperor, “voilà douze ans que tu me tiens rigueur.”

‘Then there was silence, which the Emperor broke by saying :

“Je crois que nous ferions mieux de nous asseoir.”

‘He stood with his back to the fire, the Empress and I sitting on each side, and Mme. Walewska standing behind the Empress. Then the child was sent for. I took him in my arms and kissed him; he looked astonished. The Emperor took him between his knees and told him to repeat one of his fables.

“ I have forgotten the beginnings,” he said.

“ Then give us the ends,” said his father.

“ I have forgotten them, too.”

“ Then let us hear the middle.”

“ Papa,” replied the child, “ où commence un milieu ?”

“ Your Majesty will find it difficult to answer that question,” I said.

Since then she saw the Emperor and the Empress almost every day.

Mme. Cornu was short, broad, and curiously like the Buonapartes in appearance.

At Mme. Mohl's we often used to meet the great Russian novelist, Ivan Tourguéniéff, and more often were tantalized by seeing his empty chair, for he was the most casual of men. He had some distant relations of the same name who lived in Paris, whom we knew very well. This elder Tourguéniéff was an honourable and upright, and also a very rich man, the owner of 600 serfs. He was high in political office at the time of the Emperor Alexander's death, was falsely accused of being cognisant of the conspiracy which broke out immediately afterwards, and condemned to death. Fortunately, he was travelling at the time. His property was given to his brother, who carried over the proceeds on his own person, and gave them to the rightful owner. Years afterwards he took an active part in the emancipation of the serfs and set free all his own. In 1870 he and his family, as well as Ivan Tourguéniéff, took refuge in London during the Franco-German War, and we saw them often.

A lecture was given one day in the Egyptian Hall by Mr. Ralston on Russia. The hall was crowded. The lecturer suddenly exclaimed, 'If you wish to see the man who conduced most to the emancipation of the serfs, turn round, he is amongst you!' The whole audience rose to do honour to the elder Tourguéniëff, who was deeply affected.

Ivan was colossal and strikingly handsome, with long white hair. He was charming in manner and conversation, and a great acquisition to London society, for in 1870, as formerly in 1848, we profited greatly by the misfortunes of our neighbours across the channel. M. and Mme. Viardot Garcia received every Saturday, and Tourguéniëff frequently stayed with them. Dr. and Mme. de Mussy were also most hospitable.

Many of the distinguished exiles were our friends already, and we had a link with others in Mme. Mohl, who spent the greater part of the winter with us. Indeed, we owed many of our most agreeable friends in Paris to her. She used to ask us, when we arrived, whom we would like to meet, and in the spring of 1862 my father and I exclaimed, 'Renan!'

We had been much interested in the 'Livre de Job' and the 'Cantique des Cantiques.' She promised to bring us together, and on the following day we received this note:

'I have planned a small breakfast for you to meet Renan. His father-in-law* is just dead, and you know propriety would forbid his going out to dinner, but breakfast with you two and young Trevelyan† would go down. I'll say you're going away soon—too soon, alas! Does this suit you ?'

* Henri Scheffer.

† The present Sir George Trevelyan.

We accepted joyfully.

Renan's appearance was against him. He was fat, his arms and legs were particularly short, his face very pale, and the ultra-suavity of the Séminariste still clung to him. But one forgot all these disadvantages when he began to speak. His conversation on this and subsequent occasions was recorded by my father,* but although the substance is preserved it was impossible, especially in another language, to give the grace of form which distinguished every sentence that fell from his lips.

One never felt afraid of him, he never seemed bored or cross, nor did he discourage anyone who approached him. He was entirely without airs, and often did not even lead the conversation ; he was willing to talk on any subject suggested by his hearers. I remember being one of a circle who gathered round him at a great ball given by Léon Say at the Ministère des Finances, and he discoursed to us on St. Paul. I think it was Mignet who started the subject.

Renan's urbanity was not entirely the consequence of his bringing up, it was the result of a naturally sweet and kind disposition. We saw him frequently after our first introduction, both at our hotel and at Mme. Mohl's. To her, when she was old and ailing, to the very end of her life, he was a most kind, useful, and constant friend, and he was one of the remarkable group of men who followed her to the grave.

* 'Conversations with Distinguished Persons,' published by Hurst and Blackett in 1880.

With his horror of giving offence he must have been greatly distressed by a scene I witnessed one evening in 1863, at her house. Cousin, Guizot, Prévost Paradol, and Mignet had been dining there to meet Mme. Ristori, and after dinner they were sitting round the fire talking of the drama. As usual, there was very little light in the room, and Renan entered unannounced and stood with his back to the fire. He could not have seen the great actress, who was seated in the chimney-corner, with Cousin next to her. Suddenly, à propos of some remark of Cousin's, Renan exclaimed: 'C'est cette Italienne, cette comédienne qui joue sur le boulevard, qui dégrade l'art !'

A deep silence ensued, broken at last by the contralto tones of Ristori :

'Ce n'est pas moi, monsieur, qui dégrade l'art,' and she proceeded to administer a sharp rebuke, after which she swept majestically into the next room, where Mme. Mohl was making tea and talking to my father.

No doubt if our kind hostess had been present she would have averted the calamity. As it was, she came in in consternation. What could have offended Ristori, who had left the house? We explained, and Cousin cried out to Renan, 'Et moi qui vous lançait des coups de pied. . . .'

After 1863 my visits to Paris were interrupted. With the exception of a fortnight I spent with Mme. Mohl after the war, I did not go there again till 1877, when both M. and Mme. Renan gave me the kindest welcome. So kind, indeed, were all my father's old friends on that occasion, that I continued to visit the gay city every alternate year until 1887.

Renan's only visit to London (with the exception of some days spent there when he was a very young man and long before I knew him, for the purpose of examining some manuscripts in the British Museum) was in 1880. He came over to deliver the Hibbert Lectures, and he met with an enthusiastic reception. Punctuality was not his strong point, and on one occasion he arrived late at St. George's Hall. The officials opposed his entrance on the plea that the hall was already full to overflowing. 'But the lecture cannot begin without me,' he replied laughingly.

He and Mme. Renan dined with us one day, and delighted all our guests. The party consisted of Dean Stanley, Miss Cobbe, Mr. and Mrs. William Greg, James Fergusson, Professor Henry Smith, Mr. Marcet, and Mr. and Mrs. Haweis. A few more friends came in the evening. Renan sat on a sofa and made himself as agreeable as possible to all who wished to be introduced to him. It was the first time that he had been present at an English evening party, and he was much amused by our standing up to talk, and our incessant wandering to and fro. 'They all stood up like trees,' he said afterwards. He and Mme. Renan paid us two long afternoon visits, and although no company was present he was as brilliant as if he had been addressing the most distinguished audience. I was anxious to know something about the Protestant preachers in the Cévennes after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and he gave us an interesting disquisition on the subject.

My last recollection of him was on my last visit to Paris in 1886. He received at the Collège de France one afternoon and one evening in every week, and my daughter and I were constant guests. He used to sit in his armchair, talking as no one else could talk, giving an equally kind welcome to all-comers, surrounded by his family, whom he loved intensely, and by whom he was adored in return. He was most fortunate in his domestic relations. His clever and attractive wife was the niece of Ary Scheffer. I refrain from saying more about her, for it was always her wish and her habit to efface herself before the husband to whom she was a true helpmeet, and whose loss she never ceased to mourn.

She did not long survive him.

CHAPTER XII.

LAST YEARS OF A HAPPY LIFE.

My father's house, with only one story above the drawing-room, and standing in a shady garden, had all the appearance of a house in the country, and, like a country house, was almost always full of 'staying company.' The Whatelys, Hampdens, Hawtreys, Austins, Count Arrivabene, the Jeunes, Peyronnets and Hughes, and many other friends, English and foreign, were frequently with us, as well as the families on both sides. My mother, therefore, had all the duties of a châtelaine added to the toil and turmoil of a large London circle, for, besides our grave dinner and breakfast parties there were dances, large and small, and musical parties for us young people. It was no wonder that, soon after I came out, she gave up evening entertainments, except operas and concerts, and parties at home. As hostess she contributed greatly to the pleasantness of our house; she had the art of putting people at their ease; she was unaffectedly glad to see them, and by enjoying herself promoted their enjoyment. If the lady of the house is cold and dismal, so becomes the party—it is like a yellow fog; but my mother's high spirits and cordial welcome had the effect of sunshine.

Our house was never so gay as during the Great Exhibition of 1862. My father was one of the jurors, and he used to bring some of his colleagues every day to our late breakfast. We kept almost open house. Nearly all the most distinguished of our foreign friends came to London, for international exhibitions had not yet lost their novelty. The Jeunes, the Whatelys, the Peyronnets, and Mme. Mohl came to stay with us. We had people to dine continually, and on Fridays received upwards of one hundred people in the evening.

These were very polyglot assemblies. I find an entry in my mother's pocket-book of a dinner of twelve, of whom seven were foreigners. French was, of course, the language generally spoken; but once even French failed, when our delightful Eastern friend Hekekyan Bey brought his wife to dine with us quietly. This was a very great favour, and to please us she wore the costume of her country, black satin vest and trousers—not at all becoming to a stout elderly lady: it was enough to cure one for ever of a fancy for what is now called 'rational dress.' She was very amiable-looking, but she spoke no European language, so it was difficult to get on with her. Most fortunately Sir Adrian Dingli, Chief Justice of Malta, was with us, and could talk to her in Arabic. Her husband spoke perfect English. He was tall and handsome (like a northern Italian), and very agreeable. My father recorded many of his conversations in his 'Journals in Egypt,'* sometimes under his real name, at others as Bedross Effendi. Both he and his wife were Christians and Armenians.

Our Irish trip in the autumn of 1862 suited us remarkably well. We travelled upwards of two hundred miles on outside cars. First, to the north, to visit the Heygates and Macnaghtens, close to the Giant's Causeway; then all round by the wild west, through Westport, Enniskillen, and Sligo, to Captain Houston's, at Dhulough, on Killary Harbour, in which a Spanish galleon is said to be sunk; passing through the wonderful country over which the volcanic peak of Croagh-Patrick towers; then through Galway to Mount Trenchard, Lord Monteagle's place on the Shannon, close to the scene of the murder of the Colleen Bawn. Lord Monteagle told the sad story to us most graphically on the spot. It was his duty, as magistrate, to capture the murderer.

I had always longed to see Killarney, for even our Swiss courier, Stury, used to go into ecstasies about its beauty, and to declare that if only it were blue it would be the most beautiful lake in the world. After leaving Mount Trenchard we spent two delightful days on the lake and its surroundings in glorious weather. We had intended making a tour round by Kenmare and Glengariff, but on the third day pouring rain came on, which, in Ireland, after a spell of fine weather, never knows how to stop. So we turned back pusillanimously, and went to Birr Castle, where we were always sure of a welcome and of very interesting society. Lord and Lady Rosse were among our kindest friends. Like most distinguished scientific men, he was perfectly simple, full of information, and of curious stories about the people and things he had seen. Lady Rosse shared in all his pursuits, to which she added photography.

* Published in 1882.

The Castle is very ancient ; portions are earlier than any record, but the main building belongs to the time of Elizabeth. It has sustained several sieges. During the Commonwealth it was defended by Lord Rosse's ancestor, Sir Laurence Parsons, and one of the towers retains the marks of cannon-shot. It has large out-houses, in which the processes for manufacturing the celebrated telescopes are carried on, so there was plenty to see even in the rain. When the moon was not too full, and the skies not too clouded, we used to watch the heavens after dinner, looking into, not through, the gigantic telescopes.

On the 19th we went down to Cardtown to visit Mr. Stuart Trench, Lord Lansdowne's agent, and the author of the amusing 'Realities of Irish Life.' He told us all sorts of good stories, but I was not allowed to put them into my father's 'Ireland' when I published his journals in 1868, as the 'Realities' were on the point of coming out. He permitted me to retain the more serious conversations.

On the 23rd we returned to Birr, where we stayed till we went to Dublin to visit my uncle, Edward Senior, and the Whatelys.

My father was particularly well this winter, and able to dine out a great deal. He was not one of those men who vote going to see their friends a bore. He liked to find them at home, and to pay them long visits, not visits of ceremony. He gave up large evening parties, but several times a week found us at Lady William Russell's.

We had one curious visitor, Mr. Home, the medium. He was a great friend of my aunt, Mrs. Henry Senior, and was kind enough to give us three séances. We also met him at other places. The first of these séances was by far the most remarkable, and was very puzzling, since we knew that he had never been in our house before ; also, he was in evening dress, and had no means of concealing paraphernalia of any kind. Our dining-room opened into the library, where we all assembled before dinner, consequently Mr. Home had no opportunity for tampering with the furniture in the drawing-room. After dinner we went upstairs, and I sat on a sofa in one corner of the room, knitting, until I was called to join the party round the large heavy table we had moved in from the next room. I then put my work down on a gipsy table by the side of the sofa. Mr. Home was talking to Mme. du Quaire at the farthest corner of the room. When we had been seated about ten minutes we heard knocks in the ceiling, the walls, and all around us ; a cold wind played on our hands, and the room, the table, and our chairs began to shake with a tremulous motion resembling that of the deck of a screw steamer. This motion continued uninterruptedly during the séance. There was quite the usual amount of light, and a lamp stood in the middle of the table round which we sat. The motion became so violent that, in spite of Mr. Home's protestations that no mischief would happen, my father lifted it off and set it on the piano close by. The table tilted up, and from side to side, and then moved horizontally towards the window, pushing before it those who sat on that side. Five knocks were given under the table, and I was told to read the alphabet. A single knock marked the letter to be written down, and when the knocks ceased the letters formed this sentence addressed to me : 'Mary, your grandmother watches over you, though she never saw you.' My mother and I saw a hand appear above the table, which was immediately withdrawn. The little gipsy table by the sofa on which I had been sitting, and which I know no one else had approached, waddled on its three legs (without castors) up to the big table and stopped with a bang between Mr. Home and my mother ; it was put back, but ran up again in about a quarter of an hour. My brother exclaimed, 'The devil must be in it!' on which this sentence was rapped out : 'God is too near for the devil to harm you.' My father willed the table to be heavy, and could not move it ; he then willed it to be light, and he could lift it with one finger. At length, 'We can do no more ; good-night, God bless you!' was rapped out. The room ceased to rock, the knocks left the table, went into the walls, and gradually died out farther and farther off in the high road.

We were present at several other séances in our own and our friends' houses. There was always plenty of light, never a cloth on the table, and we were allowed to look under it as often as we pleased. Sometimes, after rocking backwards and forwards, the table would rise straight up about two feet from the ground, and then drop down with a bang. The dinner-bell would pass under the table, ringing without our touching it, and other quite inexplicable though absolutely trivial noises and messages were given. But the first séance was the most striking. From all I saw and heard, then and since, the manifestations make no progress. The spirits in another world are far more foolish and childish than they were on earth, and never in any of their communications rise above the mind of the medium. But it is quite impossible to account for them.

My aunt, Mrs. Henry Senior, was a woman of great frankness and scrupulous veracity. In August, 1866, I was staying with her quite alone in her cottage, Glassdrummond, County Down, Ireland. My husband was in England, and no one was in the house except her servants and my baby and nurse. In the evening she asked me to sit at a table with her. The table rocked, tilted, and ran, and rapped out the following message, 'We will tell you the future,' and soon after, 'Love one another. Good-night.' Nothing more trite could have been invented, but how were the raps made? Certainly not by me nor by my aunt. We should both have invented something more interesting.

To return to earlier days. In the spring of 1863 we went to Paris, where we lived in a perfect whirl—dined out every evening and saw people all day long; and such interesting people that one's mind was always on the full stretch. The only quiet time was before our eleven o'clock breakfast, when I read through Howson and Conybeare's 'St. Paul,' by way of a sedative. But my father had not even this period of rest, for he used to have private interviews with busy statesmen early in the morning, and those conversations which I found it quite enough to listen to he used mentally to record, and afterwards to put down on paper. It was too much, at the age of seventy-two, and I have always dated his failure in health from that time. We returned home in the midst of the London season, and were as sociable as ever.

It was intensely hot in June and July, and for the first time in our recollection my father did not seem up to the mark. My brother was staying with us, and he said to me that often on entering the library he found my father sitting in his armchair doing nothing, which, as he was never given to dreaming, made us uneasy. In the autumn he and I paid some visits in Scotland, and when we were at Sir Edward Colebrooke's, he fainted away when out walking with Sir Archibald Alison. He seemed quite well next day, and went on to Edinburgh. I met him a few days afterwards at Kingston, Lord and Lady Belper's. There were always pleasant people staying there; on this occasion Mr. and Mrs. Grote and Sir John Romilly. Lady Belper was an ideal hostess, beautiful and gracious; she put everybody into a good humour.

We paid another very agreeable visit to Lord and Lady Grey at their delightful place, Howick. It has the great charm of a private bit of sea at the end of the woods surrounding the house. Nothing is so romantic as the sea or so prosaic as a watering-place; it is a real privilege when you can have the former without the latter. One day I walked with Miss Copley to Dunstanborough Castle, celebrated by Turner in the 'Liber Studiorum.' He has by no means exaggerated its grandeur.

From Howick we went on to the Speaker's, at Ossington. He and Lady Charlotte Denison were always extremely kind to us, and when in London I used to enjoy very much the place she offered to me in her box at the House of Commons.

There were many pleasant guests at Ossington; the one who most struck me was the very interesting and remarkable young philanthropist Edward Denison, whose career was so soon to be cut short. My father's principal subjects of interest were the same as his, and I used to like to see them walking arm-in-arm for hours together in the grounds, engaged in earnest conversation.

I was not at all happy about my father's health; he seemed to have passed suddenly from youth to age in the last few months. His failure was still more apparent in the winter, when we paid a visit to the Ashburtons at the Grange. Our host likewise was in declining health. It was a melancholy year for my father. He lost in it successively Lord Lansdowne, Sir George Cornwall Lewis, Archbishop Whately—all his most intimate friends. 'Life,' which, as he said a short time before, 'was so delightful that he wished for nothing better than a hundred more years of it,' was gradually losing its attractions, and although he was never irritable, his cheerful spirits fell.

We watched him with great care and anxiety throughout the winter. His friends and relations flocked around him, and my brother and sister-in-law took up their abode with us. He had always, as the eldest of the family, been the providence of his brothers and sisters, and the only two who remained, with the widow of Colonel Senior, devoted themselves to him. He could not read much, and we read to him in turns all day long, unless he was well enough to see the numerous visitors who kindly called. Dean Stanley was frequently with him, and Lord Grey was another constant visitor. His interest in political life never flagged, although he felt that his share in it was over. He was skilfully and assiduously treated by Dr. de Mussy, who since 1858, when we met at Malvern, had become one of our most intimate friends. He called in consultation Sir Henry Holland and Sir Thomas Watson, and everything was tried that art or science could suggest. The Newtons were often with us, and it was at this time that Mrs. Newton made the very striking sketch of my father to which I have before alluded.

The recent death of the great novelist Thackeray had made us even more intimate with his daughters, drawn together as we were by the great sorrow which had fallen upon them, and the similar grief which was impending over us. We had always lived a great deal in our garden. The spring of 1864 was unusually warm and fine; my father rallied a little, and sat out on the lawn all day long. There was no visitor he liked to see better than Miss Thackeray, and she wrote the following touching account of those last days in the Cornhill for August:

* Mr. Senior had been ill for some time, and was scarcely able to go beyond his garden ; but every day, besides the members of his own family, some of his friends and acquaintance would come and see him and sit with him, talking of the topics of the day. The last time the writer saw him, Mr. Senior was, as usual, sitting out on his lawn, shaded from the sunshine by the trees which he had himself planted when he laid out the garden and built the house in which he was to live for so many years. A rug was wrapped round his knees, a table with papers stood beside him, and one or two of his friends were coming across the grass. It was not much to see, and yet we remember the pleasant impression which came to us as we witnessed the little scene : sunshine, early summer green, the distant hum of sounds, the gathering of friends, the host seated in his chair, and welcoming each of the new-comers with kindly courtesy. As we enter it is to leave the haste and the noise and the dusty glare of the world without, and to come into a green and tranquil garden, where a man, after long years of labour, is peacefully resting and enjoying his last spring days.

*

*

*

*

*

‘ His disposition was singularly sweet and placid ; there was constant kindness, great sweetness of temper, and although great reserve and little expression of feeling, there was a deep and unfailing affection and fidelity towards those whom he loved best. Painful subjects, unavoidable misfortunes, he would never allow to be dwelt on. He has often said, even quite lately, that he would gladly live a hundred years longer, and that life was to him a constant happiness and interest and occupation.

“Till many years over thy head return,
So may'st thou live, till like ripe fruit thou drop Into thy mother's lap, or be with ease Gathered, not harshly plucked, for death mature.”

The shady garden is now built over, and the dear old house, the scene of so much social enjoyment, has ceased to exist. Few are left who can remember it in its glory, and even they are fast disappearing, so soon the fashion of this world passes away and we are gone.

INDEX

- ABERDEEN, Earl of, 160, 217,
230, 245, 250, 262, 266
Ampère, 57, 63
Argyll, Duke of, 213
Arnold, Matthew, 275
Arrivabene, Count, 33
Austin, Charles, 188
Austin, Mrs., 116
- Babbage, Charles, 113
Balbi, Marchesa, 43
Bayne, Mrs., 286
Beaumont, Mme. de, 67
Bell, Lady, 121
Bentinck, Lord George, 250
Bowyer, Henry, 166
Bremer, Frederica, 79
Bright, John, 239, 246, 258, 263
Brookfield, Rev. W., 273
Bunbury, Sir E., 274
- Campbell, Sir Colin, 104
Canisy, Château, 303
Carlyle, T., 129
Carpenter, Miss, 270
Cavour, Camille, 40
Chambrun, M. de, 306
Changarnier, General, 308
Chantrey, Lady, 115
Chateaubriand, 64
Chevalier, Michel, 294
Chevreux, Mme., 65
Circourt, Comte de, 295
Clarendon, Lord, 265
Clive, Mrs. Archer, 128
- Cobbe, Miss, 270
Colebrooke, Sir E., 172
Corcelle, M. de, 305
Cornu, Mme., 311
Cousin, Victor, 293
Cowley, Lord, 217
- D'Azeglio, Massimo, 156
Delane, 221
Derby, Earl of, 205
D'Orsay, Count, 2
Doyle, Richard, 277
Duff Gordon, Lady, 7
Du Quaire, Mme., 53
Duvergier, M., 309
- Eastlake, Sir Charles, 113
Edgworth, Maria, 29
Edwardes, Sir Herbert, 7
Ellice, Edward, 134, 148, 204, 217
Elliot, Frederic, 157, 162
- Faucher, Léon, 52
Fleming, Mr., 115
Ford, Sir Richard, 131
- Gaesbeck, 33
Garcia, Manuel, 91
Gaskell, Mrs., 120
Gibbs, Frederick, 6
Gladstone, W. E., 236
Goldschmidt, Otto, 91
Gordon, Admiral, 249
Gore House, 2

- Greg, W. R., 278
 Grote, Mrs., 73, 199
 Guizot, 66

 Haddo, Lord, 256
 Hampden, Dr., 127
 Harris, Claudius, 87
 Hayter, Mr., 154, 224
 Hayward, Abraham, 114
 Hekekyan Bey, 321
 Herbet, M., 171
 Holland, Lord, 216
 Home, Mr., 324
 Houghton, Lord, 270
 Hughes, Jeanie, 94

 Jeune, Dr., 169

 Kent House, 104
 Kinglake, A. W., 105, 276

 Lacaita, Sir J., 277
 Lamartine, 54
 Landseer, Sir Edwin, 115
 Lansdowne, Lord, 26, 129, 150,
 176, 192, 224
 Lawrence, Sir T., 4
 Layard, Sir A. H., 169
 Lewin, Miss Jessie, 86
 Lewis, Sir Frankland, 140
 Lewis, Sir G. C., 132, 141, 215, 228
 Lind, Jenny, 86
 Lowell, J. R., 279

 MacNiel, Sir J., 190
 Malthus, 9
 Manning, Cardinal, 273
 Marcet, Mrs., 78
 Marochetti, 155
 Mérimée, Prosper, 292
 Merivale, Herman, 272
 Mierzejewski, Countess, 35
 Mignet, 294
 Mill, J. S., 8
 Milman, Dean, 125
 Milnes, Monckton, 270
 Mohl, Mme., 18, 65, 120
 Montegale, Lord, 177, 214
 Murchison, Sir R., 45

 Napoleon, Louis, 312
 Newcastle, Duke of, 151, 266
 Newton, Sir Charles, 278
 Nihell, Miss, 301
 Noel, Robert, 37

 Overstone, Lord, 189

 Paley, Mr., 129
 Pallavicini, Marchesa, 43
 Palmerston, Lord, 133
 Paradol, Prévost, 294
 Peel, Sir R., 232
 Perreyve, Abbé, 301
 Peyronnet, Mme. de, 119
 Phillips, Henry, 181
 Pitt, William, 231
 Plessis, Mlle., 51
 Procter, Mrs., 85, 121

 Quêtelet, 33

 Rachel, 51
 Raglan, Lord, 173, 183, 190
 Récamier, Mme., 64
 Reeve, Henry, 271
 Rémusat, 220, 227
 Renan, Ernest, 315
 Ristori, Mme., 317
 Rogers, Rev. W., 267
 Rogers, Samuel, 110
 Rosse, Lord, 180, 323
 Routh, Dr., 137
 Russell, Lady William, 118
 Russell, Lord John, 147, 158,
 165, 207, 212, 228

 St. Leonards, Lord, 21
 Say, Horace, 50
 Scott, Sir Walter, 257
 Senior, Nassau William, 3, 11,
 20, 28, 52, 138, 330
 Simon, Jules, 295
 Smith, Sydney, 19
 Sontag, Mlle., 93
 Spedding, James, 275
 Stanley, Dean, 281

- Stansfeld, Mr. J., 97
 Stephen, Sir James, 6, 8
 Stirling, Sir Anthony, 104
 Stratford, Lord, 246
 Strelecki, Count, 189, 277
 Sumner, George, 50
 Sutherland, Duchess of, 135

 Taylor, Tom, 29
 Thackeray, W. M., 105
 Thiers, M., 266
 Tocqueville, Alexis de, 54, 149,
 183, 300
 Tourguénieff, Ivan, 314
 Trench, Archbishop, 283

 Van de Weyer, 198, 226
 Venables, G. S., 274
 Victoria, Princess, 3
 Villiers, Charles, 104

 Wellington, Duke of, 102
 Whately, Archbishop, 12
 White, Blanco, 10
 Wildenfels, Count, 38
 Wilkie, Sir D., 4
 Witt, Mme. de, 71
 Wolowski, 53
 Wood, Sir Charles, 222

 Zwickau, 39

THE END.

December, 1897.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S
New Books & Announcements.

LONDON: 37 BEDFORD STREET.

NEW YORK: 70 FIFTH AVENUE.

Telegraphic Addresses: 'Scholarly, London'; 'Scholarly, New York.'

Dedicated by Special Permission to Her Majesty the Queen.

OLD ENGLISH GLASSES.

An Account of Glass Drinking-Vessels in England from Early Times to the end of the Eighteenth Century.

With Introductory Notices of Continental Glasses during the same period, Original Documents, etc.

By ALBERT HARTSHORNE,
Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

Illustrated by nearly 70 full-page Tinted or Coloured Plates in the best style of Lithography, and several hundred outline Illustrations in the text. Super royal 4to., price Three Guineas net.

The plates and outline illustrations are prepared for reproduction by Mr. W. S. Weatherly and Mr. R. Paul respectively, from full-size or scale drawings by the author of the actual drinking-vessels in nearly every instance. The text is printed in the finest style, and the lithographic work executed by Messrs. W. Griggs and Son. The volume is now ready for delivery.

A full prospectus, giving a complete account of the principal contents of this elaborate and magnificent work, which treats of a subject never before comprehensively undertaken for England, can be had post free on application.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND LETTERS OF THE
RT. HON. JOHN ARTHUR ROEBUCK,
Q.C., M.P.

Edited by ROBERT EADON LEADER.

With two portraits, demy 8vo., 16s.

The late Mr. Roebuck was a man of remarkable independence and strength of character. He lived through some of the most exciting periods of recent political history, and always made his presence felt. He was on terms of close intimacy with John Stuart Mill, and among his friends was Francis Place, a man who had far more influence on the politics of his time than is commonly supposed. Mr. Roebuck's early years were spent in Canada, where he educated himself in the habit of original speculative thought and independent action that made his subsequent career so remarkable. The autobiographical portion of the book closes with his youth, but the subsequent letters are unusually valuable as discussing subjects of universal and permanent interest.

RECOLLECTIONS OF AUBREY DE VERE.

In one volume, demy 8vo., with portrait, 16s.

'It presents the portrait of a noble figure, a man of letters in a sense peculiar to a day now disappearing, a man of responsible leisure, of serious thought, of grave duties, of high mind.'—Athenæum.

'The recollections are likely to be widely read, for they will interest our readers.'—Spectator.

'There are brisk studies of character, quaint old stories, bits of exquisite descriptions, excellent jests, anecdotes of famous men.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

'These "Recollections" will appeal to many sympathies, personal, political, social, literary, and religious. As a Catholic the author enjoyed the intimate friendship of Cardinal Newman and Cardinal Manning, and these pages throw additional and interesting sidelights on the character and genius of each of these distinguished men.'—Morning Post.

'They are the recollections of one whose mind has been concerned with great thoughts and subjects, and whose way has lain with great men.'—Freeman's Journal.

'A remarkable book, full of good humour and good sense, and one which no reader will wish to lay down once he has taken it up. Mr. Aubrey de Vere has long had an "audience fit though few," and the appearance of the present volume will be a point of interest both for those who knew and valued his poems, and for those who knew him for an Irishman of the "ould stock," with many kindly reminiscences of his country through more than one generation.'—St. James's Gazette.

A MEMOIR OF ANNE J. CLOUGH,

Principal of Newnham College, Cambridge.

By her Niece, BLANCHE CLOUGH.

In one volume, 8vo., 12s. 6d.

The name of Miss Clough, Principal of Newnham College, Cambridge, is familiar to all who are interested in women's education. The story of her life is, indeed, synonymous with the story of the marvellous development which has taken place during the past fifty years in the provision of higher teaching for girls and women. The earlier portion of the book contains a singularly interesting fragment of autobiography which gives a key to the high motives and strong principles that ordered and governed the whole of Miss Clough's long life. The rest of the work has been written by a niece, Miss Bertha Clough, who acted as her aunt's secretary at Newnham for several years, and lived with her on terms of the closest intimacy. Many valuable reminiscences have also been contributed by former pupils of Miss Clough's. The work is furnished with two admirable portraits, reproduced in photogravure, one from the well-known picture by J. Shannon, R.A., in Newnham College, the other from a photograph by Mrs. Frederick Myers. 'To know Miss Clough is to love her,' were the words of one who had ample opportunities of judging, and they may well serve as a comprehensive motto for this volume.

BENIN, THE CITY OF BLOOD.

An Account of the Benin Expedition.

By R. H. BACON, Commander R.N.

Illustrated by W. H. OVEREND.

In one volume, demy 8vo., 7s. 6d.

Commander Bacon was the Naval Intelligence Officer to the Benin Expedition, 1897. He gives in this volume an interesting and lucid account of the incidents of the expedition, of the country and its people, and of the city which has been till now the capital of unenlightened paganism and of superstitious barbarity. Mr. Overend has illustrated the work from sketches and descriptions by the author.

WITH THE BRITISH MISSION TO MENELIK, 1897.

By COUNT GLEICHEN,
Captain Grenadier Guards, Intelligence Officer to the Mission.

With numerous Illustrations by the Author and a Map. Demy 8vo., 16s.

This book gives the only authentic account of the extremely interesting mission to Menelik in 1897. Every day the relations of this country with Abyssinia are becoming more important as our advance up the Nile progresses; while in Somaliland and at Kassala we shall shortly find ourselves face to face with the 'Empire of Ethiopia.' Much has happened since Sir Gerald Portal's Mission to Abyssinia some years ago, and the present expedition, headed by Mr. Rennell Rodd, passed through an entirely new country and had opportunities never before enjoyed by Englishmen of examining its resources and observing the power of Menelik's military dominion.

Count Gleichen has already made a literary reputation by his work, 'With the Camel Corps up the Nile,' and has written an entertaining and very valuable book.

MANY MEMORIES OF MANY PEOPLE.

By Mrs. M. C. SIMPSON (née NASSAU-SENIOR).

One vol., demy 8vo., 16s.

The daughter of the late Mr. Nassau-Senior could not fail to have an ample fund of reminiscences of interesting people and famous events. Mrs. Simpson had the advantage of being her father's companion for many years, and in his company she enjoyed the society, both in England and France, of nearly all the distinguished people of the day, both men and women. Mr. Senior's 'Conversations' are well-known for their wealth of literary and political information, and the lapse of time now permits his daughter to make public several very interesting conversations which have hitherto been withheld. Mrs. Simpson's own recollections are naturally of a lighter cast, and many a good-natured anecdote she tells of Englishmen and Frenchmen whose names are household words, and of whose lives every detail is of interest.

It is hoped that the volume will be ready in January.

STYLE.

By WALTER RALEIGH,

Professor of English Literature at University College, Liverpool ;

Author of 'Robert Louis Stevenson,' etc.

One vol., crown 8vo., 5s.

'In our judgment Mr. Raleigh's volume on "style" is an amazingly good and pre-eminently interesting and suggestive book.'—Speaker.

'Men interested in the finer questions of literary study will welcome this work as a valuable contribution to the discussion of a subject which can never have its interest exhausted so long as it gives rise to books like these.'—Scotsman.

ROME : THE MIDDLE OF THE WORLD.

By ALICE GARDNER,

Lecturer in History at Newnham College ;

Author of 'Friends of the Olden Time,' etc.

With Illustrations and Map. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

CONTENTS :

i. How Rome became the Middle of the World.—ii. Augustus, and what he did for Rome.—iii. Nero and his Times.—iv. Trajan and Hadrian.—v. The Severi.—vi. Constantine the Great.—vii. The Goths and the Huns.—viii. Theodoric and Justinian.—ix. Renewal of the Empire in Rome.—x. Emperors and Popes.—xi. Kings and Popes.—xii. Rienzi the Tribune.—xiii. The Medici Popes.—xiv. The World without a Middle.

FIFTY SUPPERS.

By Colonel KENNEY HERBERT,

Author of 'Common-sense Cookery,' etc.

Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.

A companion volume to the popular booklets, 'Fifty Dinners,' 'Fifty Breakfasts,' and 'Fifty Lunches.'

THE CHIPPENDALE PERIOD IN ENGLISH FURNITURE.

By K. WARREN CLOUSTON.

With 200 Illustrations by the Author.

Demy 4to., handsomely bound. One guinea, net.

CONTENTS :

i. Introduction.—ii. Sir William Chambers.—iii. Thomas Chippendale.—iv. Chippendale's Contemporaries.—v. The Brothers Adam.—vi. Thomas Shearer.—vii. A. Hepplewhite.—viii. Thomas Sheraton.

This handsome volume is enriched with illustrations which will be of great value to collectors, and of interest to any person of taste. It fills a distinct gap in the annals of art, and that in a manner not too technical for the Philistine in search of enlightenment.—Daily Telegraph.

'Mr. Clouston has done his work thoroughly well, and has produced a book which will be of real value not only to the serious student of the history of furniture, but to every reader who wishes to be well informed upon a topic at once so pleasant and so popular.'—Standard.

BALLADS OF THE FLEET.

By RENNELL RODD, C.B., C.M.G.

One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.

A new volume of poems by the poet-diplomatist, Mr. Rennell Rodd.

LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY.

By the VENERABLE ARCHDEACON AGLLEN.

One vol., crown 8vo., 4s. 6d.

The Archdeacon of St. Andrews is known to literature for his scholarly contributions to the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' for his translation of the Odes of Horace, and as the editor of 'Selections from the Writings of Dean Stanley.'

MORE BEASTS (FOR WORSE CHILDREN).

By H. B. and B. T. B.,

Authors of 'The Bad Child's Book of Beasts.'

One vol., 4to., 3s. 6d.

This is a companion volume to the book by the same authors which appeared last Christmas and was very warmly received. It is hoped that the present work will be equally acceptable, from the irresistible drollery of its illustrations and its fascinating nonsense verses.'

FIRE AND SWORD IN THE SUDAN.

By SLATIN PASHA.

Translated and Edited by COLONEL WINGATE, C.B.,

Chief of the Intelligence Department Egyptian Army.

A new, revised, and cheaper edition of this famous work.

Illustrated. Price 6s.

In this edition the book has been thoroughly revised by the authors, omitting certain matters of temporary interest, and making it as far as possible a standard work of permanent value for young and old. The striking illustrations by Mr. Talbot Kelly have been retained.

'The story of the experiences of Slatin Pasha as a ruler, a soldier, and a captive in the Sudan is one of the most striking romances of modern times. The return of this distinguished officer, after a disappearance of eleven years and more, from what Father Ohrwalder with bitter recollections calls a "living grave," and the perilous incidents of his escape and flight, form in themselves an extraordinary tale. But the interest of the book is much increased by the importance which, in the minds of English people, attaches to the melancholy events in which he bore a part, and by the narrative in which this witness risen from the dead reopens the story of the great tragedy of Khartoum.'—Speaker.

'Whether Slatin's work is more important and attractive as a powerful exhortation on a subject of the greatest political importance and of special national significance from the noble English blood spilt in the Sudan, or as a chapter of human experience wherein truth far surpassed fiction in hair-breadth escapes and deeds of daring beyond what seemed possible, it would be difficult to decide; but the whole result is one that places this volume on a shelf of its own, not merely as the book of the day, but as the authority for all time on the great Mahommedan upheaval in the Sudan, which was accompanied by an amount of human slaughter and suffering that defies calculation.'—Times.

New Novels.

PAUL MERCER.

G Tale of Repentance among Millions.

By the Hon. and Rev. JAMES ADDERLEY.

Author of 'Stephen Remarx.'

One vol., crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

JOB HILDRED.

*A*rtist and Carpenter.

By Dr. RICHARDS.

Edited by ELLEN F. PINSENT.

Author of 'Jenny's Case,' 'No Place for Repentance,' etc.

One vol., crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

THE KING WITH TWO FACES.

By M. E. COLERIDGE,

Author of 'The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus,' etc.

One vol., crown 8vo., 6s.

THE SON OF A PEASANT.

By EDWARD McNULTY,

Author of 'Misther O'Ryan,' etc.

One vol., crown 8vo., 6s.

NETHERDYKE.

By R. J. CHARLETON,

Author of 'Newcastle Town,' etc.

One vol., crown 8vo., 6s.

The Sportsman's Library.

Edited by the RT. HON. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, BART., M.P.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.

REMINISCENCES OF A HUNTSMAN.

By the HON. GRANTLEY F. BERKELEY.

With a Coloured Frontispiece and the original Illustrations by JOHN LEECH, and several Coloured Plates and other Illustrations by G. R. JALLAND.

Large 8vo., handsomely bound, 15s. Also a Large-Paper Edition, limited to 200 copies, two guineas net.

These reminiscences, by one well known among sportsmen of his day, consist of an interesting medley of records of the chase, observations on men and manners of the time, notes on natural history, and experiences in shooting and fishing. The author was a bit of a character, and his peculiarities are faithfully reflected in his pages. As a master of hounds he forms a curious link with a bygone state of things, when his father hunted the whole country between Bristol and Kensington Gardens.

THE ART OF DEER-STALKING.

By WILLIAM SCROPE.

With Frontispiece by EDWIN LANDSEER, and 9 Photogravure Plates of the original Illustrations.

Large 8vo., handsomely bound, 15s. Also a Large-Paper Edition, limited to 200 copies, two guineas net.

The author of this book, which has long been in the first rank of literature of the forest, was an example of the best kind of sportsman. A highly cultivated scholar and a painter far more accomplished than most amateurs, Scrope had a keen eye for a great deal more than the mere pursuit of game. He filled his notebook with traditions and anecdotes collected among stalkers and gillies in an age before compulsory education had driven old-world lore out of their heads, and wove them into his treatise on deer-stalking with great taste and literary skill.

The Sportsman's Library.

Edited by the RIGHT HON. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, BART., M.P.

A Re-issue, in handsome volumes, of certain rare and entertaining books on sport, carefully selected by the Editor, and illustrated by the best sporting artists of the day, and with reproductions of old plates.

Library Edition, 15s. a Volume.

Large Paper Edition (limited to 200 copies), 2 guineas a volume.

The EARL OF COVENTRY writes: 'I think the idea of a "Sportsman's Library" an excellent one. So many now follow various sports that a library of the old books brought out again will be very attractive.'

Sir RALPH PAYNE-GALLWEY, Bart., writes: 'Just the class of work to be popular, whether in the shelves or lying on the smoking-room table. A pleasure to read, see, and handle.'

VOLUME I.

THE LIFE OF A FOX, AND THE DIARY OF A HUNTSMAN.

By THOMAS SMITH, Master of the Hambledon and Pytchley Hounds.

With Illustrations by the Author, and Coloured Plates by G. H. JALLAND.

'It will be a classic of fox-hunting till the end of time.'—Yorkshire Post.

VOLUME II.

A SPORTING TOUR THROUGH THE NORTHERN PARTS OF ENGLAND AND GREAT PART OF THE HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

By COLONEL T. THORNTON, of Thornville Royal, in Yorkshire.

With the Original Illustrations by GARRARD, and other Illustrations and Coloured Plates by G. E. LODGE.

'Sportsmen of all descriptions will gladly welcome the sumptuous new edition issued by Mr. Edward Arnold of Colonel T. Thornton's "Sporting Tour," which has long been a scarce book.'—Daily News.

VOLUME III.

THE SPORTSMAN IN IRELAND.

By a COSMOPOLITE.

With Coloured Plates and Black and White Drawings by P. CHENEVIX TRENCH, and reproductions of the Original Illustrations drawn by R. ALLEN and engraved by W. WESTALL, A.R.A.

'The book is one to be read and enjoyed.'—Saturday Review.

Volumes of Sport, Travel and Adventure.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

WILD NORWAY :

With Chapters on the Swedish Highlands, Jutland, and Spitzbergen.

By ABEL CHAPMAN, Author of 'Wild Spain,' etc.

With seventeen full-page Illustrations and numerous smaller ones by the Author and CHARLES WHYMPER.

Demy 8vo., 16s.

'There is not a chapter in this book which would not be missed.'—Spectator.

A very good, very accurate, and deeply interesting book of wild life and natural history.'—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

'Will be read with keen interest by the angler, the hunter of wild game, and the student of bird life.'—Scotsman.

'It will be found not only an invaluable but a delightful companion by the sportsman, the angler, and the ornithologist.'—Times.

THROUGH UNKNOWN AFRICAN COUNTRIES.

The First Expedition from Somaliland to Lake
Rudolf and Lamu.

A Narrative of Scientific Exploration and Sporting Adventures.

By A. DONALDSON SMITH, M.D., F.R.G.S.

With nearly thirty full-page Plates and numerous smaller Illustrations by A. D. MCCORMICK, CHARLES WHYMPER, etc., and detailed Maps of the countries traversed.

Super royal 8vo., One Guinea net.

'Will be of the greatest interest to sportsman, traveller, and man of science.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

'Since the publication of Stanley's "Across the Dark Continent," there has been no work of African travel equal, in scientific importance and thrilling interest, to Dr. Donaldson Smith's book. As a book of exciting sport, apart from its geographical and ethnological usefulness, it deserves to stand alongside the best experiences of the toughest Anglo-Indian shikaris.'—Daily Telegraph.

'While to the large class of people interested in African exploration this book is indispensable, sportsmen will find in its pages a wealth of exciting incidents rarely equalled in similar works.'—St. James's Gazette.

ON VELDT AND FARM :

In Cape Colony, Bechuanaland, Natal, and the Transvaal.

By FRANCES MCNAB.

With Map. Crown 8vo., 300 pages, 3s. 6d.

'Well worth the study of those interested in the agricultural and general development of South Africa.'—Saturday Review.

'A delightful book, and we can confidently recommend it as far more worth reading than many a work of infinitely greater pretensions. The whole work is full of interest, and is, moreover, written in a style that compels the attention of the reader.'—Globe.

'Abounds in interesting and useful information.'—Daily News.

SOLDIERING AND SURVEYING IN BRITISH EAST AFRICA, 1891-1894.

An Account of the Survey for the Uganda Railway, and the various Campaigns in the British Protectorate during the last few years.

By Major J. R. MACDONALD, R.E.

Illustrated from Sketches and Photographs by the Author and numerous Plans and a Map.

Demy 8vo., 16s.

'No country in the world has had greater need of an impartial historian than Uganda, and, strange to say, though the bitter feelings engendered by the struggles of the past ten years have not had time to cool, one has been found among the actors in these stormy scenes—Major Macdonald. . . . No one who reads this exciting book of adventure can regret that we are spending £3,000,000 on the railway. Major Macdonald writes with considerable literary and historical skill, and his sketches and maps are all excellent.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

'The illustrations from photographs and sketches are better than any we have seen of this part of the Dark Continent, and the maps are distinctly good.'—Daily Chronicle.

MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS.

Leaves from a Field Naturalist's Note-book.

By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.

Crown 8vo., with four Photogravure Illustrations, 6s.

'It is a very long time since we have read so pleasant a book as this.'—Daily Chronicle.

'Most agreeably and freshly written.'—Field.

'Few books will fill the idle moments of a country-loving man more pleasantly.'—British Review.

'The easy style, the graphic descriptions of bird-life, and of the ways of beasts and fishes, the clever sketches of sport, the happy introductions of plant-lore and of fragments of myth and legend, will ensure a warm welcome for this delightful volume.'—Daily News.

FISH TAILS AND SOME TRUE ONES.

By BRADNOCK HALL, Author of 'Rough Mischance.'

With an original Etching by the Author, and twelve full-page Illustrations by T. H. MCLACHLAN.

Crown 8vo., 6s.

'This is one of the best books of angling reminiscences I have ever come across.'—Fishing Gazette.

'A pleasant companion for an angler's holiday.'—Glasgow Herald.

'Witty, in the best taste, and abounding with sympathetic interest to the angler. . . . The illustrations are exceedingly good. . . . The stories are capital, every one.'—Field.

Volumes of Travel, Sport, and Adventure.

- Bacon—THE CITY OF BLOOD. (See page 3.)
- Balfour—TWELVE HUNDRED MILES IN A WAGGON. A Narrative of a Journey in Cape Colony, the Transvaal, and the Chartered Company's Territories. By ALICE BLANCHE BALFOUR. With nearly forty original Illustrations from Sketches by the Author, and a Map. Demy 8vo., cloth, 16s.
- Beynon—WITH KELLY TO CHITRAL. By Lieutenant W. G. L. BEYNON, D.S.O., 3rd Goorkha Rifles, Staff Officer to Colonel Kelly with the Relief Force. With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d.
- Bottomé—A SUNSHINE TRIP: Glimpses of the Orient. Extracts from Letters written by MARGARET BOTTOMÉ. With Portrait, elegantly bound, 4s. 6d.
- Bull—THE CRUISE OF THE 'ANTARCTIC.' To the South Polar Regions. By H. J. BULL, a member of the Expedition. With frontispiece by W. L. WYLLIE, A.R.A., and numerous full-page illustrations by W. G. BURN-MURDOCH. Demy 8vo., 15s.
- Chapman—WILD NORWAY. (See page 11.)
- Colville—THE LAND OF THE NILE SPRINGS. By Colonel Sir HENRY COLVILLE, K.C.M.G., C.B., recently British Commissioner in Uganda. With Photogravure Frontispiece, 16 full-page Illustrations and 2 Maps. Demy 8vo., 16s.
- Custance—RIDING RECOLLECTIONS AND TURF STORIES. By HENRY CUSTANCE, three times winner of the Derby. One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Freshfield—THE EXPLORATION OF THE CAUCASUS. By DOUGLAS W. FRESHFIELD, lately President of the Alpine Club and Honorary Secretary of the Royal Geographical Society. With Contributions by H. W. HOLDER, J. G. COCKIN, H. WOOLLEY, M. DE DECHY, and Prof. BONNEY, D.Sc., F.R.S. Illustrated by 3 Panoramas, 74 full-page Photogravures, about 140 Illustrations in the text, chiefly from Photographs by VITTORIO SELLA, and 4 Original Maps, including the first authentic map of the Caucasus specially prepared from unpublished sources by Mr. FRESHFIELD. In two volumes, large 4to., 600 pp., Three Guineas net.
- Gordon—PERSIA REVISITED. With Remarks on H.I.M. Mozuffered-Din Shah, and the Present Situation in Persia (1896). By General Sir T. E. GORDON, K.C.I.E., C.B., C.S.I. Formerly Military Attaché and Oriental Secretary to the British Legation at Teheran, Author of 'The Roof of the World,' etc. Demy 8vo., with full-page illustrations, 10s. 6d.
- Hall—FISH TAILS AND SOME TRUE ONES. (See page 12.)
- Hole—A LITTLE TOUR IN AMERICA. By the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE, Dean of Rochester, Author of 'The Memories of Dean Hole,' 'A Book about Roses,' etc. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 16s.
- Hole—A LITTLE TOUR IN IRELAND. By 'OXONIAN' (the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE). With nearly forty Illustrations by JOHN LEECH. Large crown 8vo., 6s.
- Knight-Bruce—MEMORIES OF MASHONALAND. By the late Right Rev. Bishop KNIGHT-BRUCE, formerly Bishop of Mashonaland. 8vo., 10s. 6d.
- Macdonald—SOLDIERING AND SURVEYING IN BRITISH EAST AFRICA. (See page 12)

- McNab—ON VELDT AND FARM. (See page 11.)
- Maxwell—THE SPORTSMAN'S LIBRARY. (See pages 9 and 10.)
- Maxwell—MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS. (See page 12.)
- Pike—THROUGH THE SUB-ARCTIC FOREST. A Record of a Canoe Journey for 4,000 miles, from Fort Wrangel to the Pelly Lakes, and down the Yukon to the Behring Sea. By WARBURTON PIKE, Author of 'The Barren Grounds of Canada.' With illustrations by CHARLES WHYMPER, from Photographs taken by the Author, and a Map. Demy 8vo., 16s.
- Pollok—FIFTY YEARS' REMINISCENCES OF INDIA. By Lieut.-Colonel POLLOK, author of 'Sport in Burmah.' Illustrated by A. C. CORBOULD. Demy 8vo., 16s.
- Portal—THE BRITISH MISSION TO UGANDA. By the late Sir GERALD PORTAL, K.C.M.G. Edited by RENNELL RODD, C.M.G. With an Introduction by the Right Honourable LORD CROMER, G.C.M.G. Illustrated from photos taken during the Expedition by Colonel RHODES. Demy 8vo., 21s.
- Portal—MY MISSION TO ABYSSINIA. By the late Sir GERALD H. PORTAL, C.B. With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 15s.
- Slatin—FIRE AND SWORD IN THE SUDAN. (See page 6.)
- Smith—THROUGH UNKNOWN AFRICAN COUNTRIES. (See page 11.)
- Stone—IN AND BEYOND THE HIMALAYAS: A Record of Sport and Travel. By S. J. STONE, late Deputy Inspector-General of the Punjab Police. With 16 full-page Illustrations by CHARLES WHYMPER. Demy 8vo., 16s.

AMERICAN SPORT AND TRAVEL.

These books, selected from the Catalogue of MESSRS. RAND McNALLY & Co., the well-known publishers of Chicago, have been placed in MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S hands under the impression that many British Travellers and Sportsmen may find them useful before starting on expeditions in the United States.

- Aldrich—ARCTIC ALASKA AND SIBERIA; or, Eight Months with the Arctic Whalemén. By HERBERT L. ALDRICH. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.
- AMERICAN GAME FISHES. Their Habits, Habitat, and Peculiarities; How, When, and Where to Angle for them. By various Writers. Cloth, 10s. 6d.
- Higgins—NEW GUIDE TO THE PACIFIC COAST. Santa Fé Route. By C. A. HIGGINS. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.
- Leffingwell—THE ART OF WING-SHOOTING. A Practical Treatise on the Use of the Shot-gun. By W. B. LEFFINGWELL. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.
- Shields—CAMPING AND CAMP OUTFITS. By G. O. SHIELDS ('Coquina'). Containing also Chapters on Camp Medicine, Cookery, and How to Load a Packhorse. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
- Shields—THE AMERICAN BOOK OF THE DOG. By various Writers. Edited by G. O. SHIELDS ('Coquina'). Cloth, 15s.
- Thomas—SWEDEN AND THE SWEDES. By WILLIAM WIDGERY THOMAS, Jun., United States Minister to Sweden and Norway. With numerous Illustrations. Cloth, 16s.

Works of Fiction.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

A DEVOTEE :

An Episode in the Life of a Butterfly.

By MARY CHOLMONDELEY, Author of 'Diana Tempest,' 'The Danvers Jewels,' etc.

Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

'The many readers and admirers of that fine novel "Diana Tempest" will welcome a new book by Miss Cholmondeley with interest and high expectation, and it is pleasant to be able to inform them that they will not be disappointed. A most original and truthful sketch.'—Westminster Gazette.

'Another of Miss Cholmondeley's clever social sketches from the world about her.'—Manchester Guardian.

'Miss Cholmondeley's sketches of young men and women belonging to fashionable society are as clever as ever.'—Athenæum.

The story is written with Miss Cholmondeley's usual vigour, brilliancy, and delicacy.'—Guardian.

A RELUCTANT EVANGELIST, AND OTHER STORIES.

By ALICE SPINNER,

Author of 'Lucilla,' 'A Study in Colour,' etc.

Crown 8vo., 6s.

'Good, too, is Miss Spinner's budget of short stories. "Buckra Tommie" is an exquisitely pathetic story.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

'Vivid and suggestive studies.'—Spectator.

'Remarkably clever studies of life and character.'—Lady.

INTERLUDES.

By MAUD OXENDEN.

Crown 8vo., 6s.

'An admirably written book. The author is to be congratulated on the strength with which she portrays men and women, and describes the passions of love or of grief that sometimes fill the mind.'—Scotsman.

THE BAYONET THAT CAME HOME.

By N. WYNNE WILLIAMS,

Author of 'Tales of Modern Greece.'

Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

'Well worth reading.'—Liverpool Mercury.

'Enthrals the reader to the end.'—Manchester Courier.

Works of Fiction.

- 'Adalet'—HADJIRA : A Turkish Love Story. By 'ADALET.' 1 vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Adderley—STEPHEN REMARX. The Story of a Venture in Ethics. By the Hon. and Rev. JAMES ADDERLEY, formerly Head of the Oxford House and Christ Church Mission, Bethnal Green. Twenty-Second Thousand. Small 8vo., elegantly bound, 3s. 6d. Also, in paper cover, 1s.
- Adderley—PAUL MERCER. (See page 7.)
- Blatchford—TOMMY ATKINS. A Tale of the Ranks. By ROBERT BLATCHFORD, Author of 'A Son of the Forge,' 'Merrie England,' etc. New Edition. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Charleton—NETHERDYKE. (See page 8.)
- Cherbuliez—THE TUTOR'S SECRET. (Le Secret du Précepteur.) Translated from the French of VICTOR CHERBULIEZ. One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Cholmondeley—A DEVOTEE. By MARY CHOLMONDELEY. (See page 15.)
- Clifford—LOVE-LETTERS OF A WORLDLY WOMAN. By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD, Author of 'Aunt Anne,' 'Mrs. Keith's Crime,' etc. One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Coleridge—THE KING WITH TWO FACES. (See page 8.)
- Collingwood—THE BONDWOMAN. A Story of the Northmen in Lakeland. By W. G. COLLINGWOOD, Author of 'Thorstein of the Mere,' 'The Life and Work of John Ruskin,' etc. Cloth, 16mo., 3s. 6d.
- Crane—GEORGE'S MOTHER. By STEPHEN CRANE. Author of 'The Red Badge of Courage.' Cloth, 2s.
- Dunmore—ORMISDAL. A Novel. By the EARL OF DUNMORE, F.R.G.S., Author of 'The Pamirs.' One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Ford—ON THE THRESHOLD. By ISABELLA O. FORD, Author of 'Miss Blake of Monkshalton.' One vol., crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.
- Gaunt—DAVE'S SWEETHEART. By MARY GAUNT. One vol., 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Hall—FISH TAILS AND SOME TRUE ONES. (See page 12.)
- Hutchinson—THAT FIDDLER FELLOW : A Tale of St. Andrews. By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON, Author of 'My Wife's Politics,' 'Golf,' 'Creatures of Circumstance,' etc. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.

- Knutsford—THE MYSTERY OF THE RUE SOLY. Translated by Lady KNUTSFORD from the French of H. DE BALZAC. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- McNulty—MISTHER O'RYAN. An Incident in the History of a Nation. By EDWARD MCNULTY. Small 8vo., elegantly bound, 3s. 6d.
- McNulty—SON OF A PEASANT. (See page 8.)
- Montrésor—WORTH WHILE. By F. F. MONTRÉSOR, Author of 'Into the Highways and Hedges.' Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Oxenden—INTERLUDES. (See page 15.)
- Pinsent—JOB HILDRED. (See page 7.)
- Prescott—A MASK AND A MARTYR. By E. LIVINGSTON PRESCOTT, Author of 'Scarlet and Steel.' Cloth, 6s.
- Spinner—A RELUCTANT EVANGELIST. (See page 15.)
- Williams—THE BAYONET THAT CAME HOME. (See page 15.)

Tales of Adventure for Boys.

- Clowes—THE DOUBLE EMPEROR. By W. LAIRD CLOWES, Author of 'The Great Peril,' etc. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.
- Fawcett—SWALLOWED BY AN EARTHQUAKE. By E. D. FAWCETT. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.
- Fawcett—HARTMANN THE ANARCHIST; or, The Doom of the Great City. By E. DOUGLAS FAWCETT. With sixteen full-page and numerous smaller Illustrations by F. T. JANE. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Fawcett—THE SECRET OF THE DESERT. By E. D. FAWCETT. With numerous full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Hervey—THE REEF OF GOLD. By MAURICE H. HERVEY. With numerous full-page Illustrations, handsomely bound. Gilt edges, 5s.
- Hervey—ERIC THE ARCHER. By MAURICE H. HERVEY. With numerous full-page Illustrations. Handsomely bound, crown 8vo., 5s.
- Munroe—THE FUR SEAL'S TOOTH. By KIRK MUNROE. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
- Munroe—SNOW-SHOES AND SLEDGES. By KIRK MUNROE. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
- Munroe—RICK DALE. By KIRK MUNROE. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
- Nash—BAREROCK; or, The Island of Pearls. By HENRY NASH. With numerous Illustrations by LANCELOT SPEED. Large crown 8vo., handsomely bound, gilt edges, 5s.

Works on Science and Philosophy.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

WASTED RECORDS OF DISEASE.

By CHARLES E. PAGET, Lecturer on Public Health in Owens College, Medical Officer of Health for Salford, etc.

Crown 8vo., 2s. 6d.

'We welcome Mr. Paget's attempt to indicate the lines on which efforts at reform may be successful.'—British Medical Journal.

'An admirable common-sense statement of the case.'—Yorkshire Post.

'An interesting summary of what has been done to register diseases.'—Sanitary Journal.

'The importance of disease registration is lucidly and ably discussed.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE RELIGIONS OF INDIA.

By E. W. HOPKINS, Ph.D. (Leipzig), Professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology in Bryn Mawr College.

One volume, demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

'Ought to meet a very distinct want. Professor Hopkins has ample learning. He knows the sacred books as few men do. He is also an independent student and critic. . . . A valuable bibliography, with works and articles classified under subjects, and a good index should be mentioned.'—Manchester Guardian.

A TEXT-BOOK OF NURSING FOR HOME AND HOSPITAL USE.

By C. WEEKS SHAW.

Revised and largely re-written by W. RADFORD, House Surgeon at the Poplar Hospital, under the supervision of Sir DYCE DUCKWORTH, M.D., F.R.C.P.

Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

'A careful perusal of its pages has convinced us that at present the book has no equal. . . . May justly be described as a standard work of its kind, and one for which we foresee an extensive circulation.'—Hospital.

'The teaching in the book is modern and thoroughly practical.'—Scottish Medical and Surgical Journal.

'The book is invaluable alike in the home and in the hospital ward.'—Cape Times.

'Should be in the hands of every nurse who is anxious to qualify herself in her profession.'—Nurses' Journal.

'We can recommend the book to nurses and practitioners alike.'—Lancet.

THE CHANCES OF DEATH, AND OTHER STUDIES IN EVOLUTION.

By KARL PEARSON, F.R.S., Author of 'The Ethic of Free Thought,' etc.

In two vols., demy 8vo., with Illustrations, 25s. net.

CONTENTS OF VOL. I.—The Chances of Death—The Scientific Aspect of Monte Carlo Roulette—Reproductive Selection—Socialism and Natural Selection—Politics and Science—Reaction—Woman and Labour—Variation in Man and Woman.

CONTENTS OF VOL. II.—Woman as Witch—Ashiepatle; or, Hans seeks his Luck—Kindred Group Marriage—The German Passion Play—Index.

'We have pleasure in welcoming a new work of extreme scientific value and of deep popular interest.'—Saturday Review.

'Worthy of the high reputation which Mr. Pearson has already earned.'—British Review.

'All of these essays are well worth reading.'—Times.

'Full of interest as regards their subject, and of animation in point of style.'—Daily Telegraph.

'These brilliant volumes contain the most satisfactory work that Professor Pearson has yet done.'—Speaker.

HABIT AND INSTINCT.

Ⓔ Study in Heredity.

By C. LLOYD MORGAN.

'Author of 'Animal Life and Intelligence,' 'The Springs of Conduct,' etc.

Demy 8vo., 16s.

'A valuable book on a fascinating subject.'—Times.

'An exceedingly interesting volume.'—British Review.

'It is a book that no one interested in the larger problem of existence can afford to neglect.'—Academy.

'An admirable introduction to the study of a most important and fascinating branch of biology.'—PROFESSOR A. R. WALLACE in Natural Science.

THE CALCULUS FOR ENGINEERS.

By Prof. JOHN PERRY, F.R.S.

Crown 8vo., 380 pp., cloth, 7s. 6d.

'A great diversity of most instructive exercises are suggested. . . . A good index enhances the value of the book. . . . The author has been successful in retaining all that liveliness and originality of illustration which distinguishes him as a lecturer.'—Electrician.

'Elle mérite tous les éloges.'—M. ALIAMET in L'Electrician.

Bryan—THE MARK IN EUROPE AND AMERICA. A Review of the Discussion on Early Land Tenure. By ENOCH A. BRYAN, A.M., President of Vincennes University, Indiana. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.

Burgess—POLITICAL SCIENCE AND COMPARATIVE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. By JOHN W. BURGESS, Ph.D., LL.D., Dean of the University Faculty of Political Science in Columbia College, U.S.A. In two volumes, demy 8vo., cloth, 25s.

Fawcett—THE RIDDLE OF THE UNIVERSE. Being an Attempt to determine the First Principles of Metaphysics considered as an Inquiry into the Conditions and Import of Consciousness. By EDWARD DOUGLAS FAWCETT. One vol., demy 8vo., 14s.

Hopkins—THE RELIGIONS OF INDIA. (See page 18.)

Ladd—LOTZE'S PHILOSOPHICAL OUTLINES. Dictated Portions of the Latest Lectures (at Göttingen and Berlin) of Hermann Lotze. Translated and edited by GEORGE T. LADD, Professor of Philosophy in Yale College. About 180 pages in each volume. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. each. Vol. I. Metaphysics. Vol. II. Philosophy of Religion. Vol. III. Practical Philosophy. Vol. IV. Psychology. Vol. V. Æsthetics. Vol. VI. Logic.

THE JOURNAL OF MORPHOLOGY. Edited by C. O. WHITMAN, Professor of Biology in Clark University, U.S.A. Three numbers in a volume of 100 to 150 large 4to. pages, with numerous plates. Single numbers, 17s. 6d.; subscription to the volume of three numbers, 45s. Volumes I. to XII. can now be obtained, and the first number of Volume XIII. is ready.

Morgan—ANIMAL LIFE AND INTELLIGENCE. By Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, F.G.S., Principal of University College, Bristol. With 40 Illustrations and a Photo-etched Frontispiece. Second Edition. Demy 8vo., cloth, 16s.

Morgan—HABIT AND INSTINCT. (See page 19.)

Morgan—THE SPRINGS OF CONDUCT. By Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, F.G.S. Cheaper Edition. Large crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.

Morgan—PSYCHOLOGY FOR TEACHERS. By Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, F.G.S. With a Preface by J. G. FITCH, M.A., LL.D., late one of H.M. Chief Inspectors of Training Colleges. One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

Paget—WASTED RECORDS OF DISEASE. (See page 18.)

Pearson—THE CHANCES OF DEATH. (See page 19.)

Perry—CALCULUS FOR ENGINEERS. (See page 19.)

THE PHILOSOPHICAL REVIEW. Edited by J. G. SCHURMAN, Professor of Philosophy in Cornell University, U.S.A. Six Numbers a year. Single Numbers, 3s. 6d.; Annual Subscription, 14s. post free. The first number was issued in January, 1892.

Shaw—A TEXT-BOOK OF NURSING. (See page 18.)

Young—A GENERAL ASTRONOMY. By CHARLES A. YOUNG, Professor of Astronomy in the College of New Jersey, Associate of the Royal Astronomical Society, Author of The Sun, etc. In one vol., 550 pages, with 250 Illustrations, and supplemented with the necessary tables. Royal 8vo., half morocco, 12s. 6d.

Works in General Literature.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

A TREASURY OF MINOR BRITISH POETRY.

Selected and Arranged, with Notes, by J. CHURTON COLLINS, M.A.

Handsomely bound, crown 8vo., 7s. 6d.

'The idea is an admirable one, and it has been admirably carried out. The book is a valuable contribution to poetical literature.'—Manchester Guardian.

'A choice and beautiful book.'—Standard.

'Few, if any, living critics have a knowledge of English literature so accurate and exhaustive as Mr. Churton Collins. When we take up an anthology compiled by him, we may be sure that no poem has been omitted from ignorance of its existence. . . . It contains an abundance of most interesting verse.'—Saturday Review.

'In this handsome volume Mr. Collins has undoubtedly succeeded in presenting to readers many exquisite poems for which they would search in vain in other collections.'—Academy.

THE TREATMENT OF NATURE IN DANTE'S 'DIVINA COMMEDIA.'

By L. OSCAR KUHNS.

Professor in Wesleyan University, Middleton, U.S.A.

Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.

'Should it fall into the hands of a student in the early stages of his acquaintance with Dante, it will delight and amaze him by the scope, the variety, and the minuteness of the references to natural objects and phenomena which it records.'—Manchester Guardian.

'Critical and erudite . . . a valuable commentary.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

A BOOK ABOUT ROSES.

By the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE, Dean of Rochester.

Author of 'A Book about the Garden,' 'A Little Tour in Ireland.'

Illustrated by H. G. MOON and G. ELGOOD.

The Presentation Edition, with coloured plates, etc., handsomely bound, 1os. 6d. ; Popular Edition, with frontispiece, 3s. 6d.

The call for a fifteenth edition of this popular work enabled Dean Hole to thoroughly revise and largely to rewrite the book, bringing the information in it well up to date. Advantage has also been taken of the opportunity to respond to the frequently expressed wishes of many admirers of the book for a more handsome and illustrated edition ; it has therefore been reprinted, and beautifully COLOURED PLATES have been drawn by Mr. H. G. Moon, while Mr. G. Elgood contributes charming black-and-white pictures. There is also a facsimile of a sketch by John Leech given to Dean Hole, and never before published.

THE BEGGARS OF PARIS.

Translated from the French of M. LOUIS PAULIAN.

By Lady HERSCHELL.

Crown 8vo., paper boards, 192 pages, 1s.

'Not only contains a great many amusing and instructive anecdotes, but formulates a definite scheme for the entire suppression of begging as a trade. Lady Herschell's excellent translation should be read by all who are interested in the vexed question of charity-giving, and even to those who read but for amusement it will prove vastly interesting.'—Times.

'One of the most interesting books which have appeared during recent years on the subject of mendicancy.'—National Observer.

'Lady Herschell's translation is worthy of M. Paulian's interesting manner.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

'A fascinating book.'—Spectator.

WAGNER'S HEROINES: BRUNHILDA—SENTA—ISOLDA.

By CONSTANCE MAUD,

Author of 'Wagner's Heroes.'

Illustrated by J. W. MAUD. Crown 8vo., 5s.

'Miss Maud's poetical and successful attempt at embodying the fantasies of Wagner in the form of tales. . . . She has made a clear advance in her second volume. . . . This is, in fine, really a beautiful casket of stories.'—Spectator.

'The volume is capitally illustrated by some really beautiful drawings from the pencil of Mr. W. T. Maud.'—Westminster Gazette.

'We recommend everyone who likes moving and lovely stories to read them.'—Saturday Review.

THE PLANT-LORE AND GARDEN-CRAFT OF SHAKESPEARE.

By HENRY N. ELLACOMBE, M.A., Vicar of Bitton,

Author of 'In a Gloucestershire Garden,' etc.

Fully Illustrated by Major E. BENGOUGH RICKETTS.

Large Crown 8vo., handsomely bound, 10s. 6d.

'A very useful work. We find an account of all the plants mentioned in Shakespeare, and quotations of all the passages in which such mention is made.'—Saturday Review.

'Mr. Ellacombe has produced a fascinating book.'—Church Times.

THE GOSPEL THE POWER OF GOD, AND OTHER SERMONS.

By CHARLES D. BELL, D.D., Honorary Canon of Carlisle.

Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

'A good example of the sound, old-fashioned Evangelical Churchmanship.'—Guardian.

- Aglen—OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. (See page 5.)
- Bell—DIANA'S LOOKING GLASS, and other Poems. By the Rev. CANON BELL, D.D., Rector of Cheltenham, and Hon. Canon of Carlisle. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s. net.
- Bell—POEMS OLD AND NEW. By the Rev. CANON BELL, D.D. Cloth, 7s. 6d.
- Bell—THE NAME ABOVE EVERY NAME, and other Sermons. By the Rev. CANON BELL, D.D. Cloth, 5s.
- Bell—THE GOSPEL AND POWER OF GOD. (See page 22.)
- Bell—KLEINES HAUSTHEATER. Fifteen Little Plays in German for Children. By Mrs. HUGH BELL. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s.
- Most of these little plays have been adapted from the author's 'Petit Théâtre,' the remainder from a little book of English plays by the same writer entitled 'Nursery Comedies.'
- Butler—SELECT ESSAYS OF SAINTE BEUVE. Chiefly bearing on English Literature. Translated by A. J. BUTLER, Translator of 'The Memoirs of Baron Marbot.' One vol., 8vo., cloth, 5s. net.
- Clouston—EARLY ENGLISH FURNITURE. (See page 5.)
- Collingwood—THORSTEIN OF THE MERE: a Saga of the Northmen in Lakeland. By W. G. COLLINGWOOD, Author of 'Life of John Ruskin,' etc. With Illustrations. Price 10s. 6d.
- Collins—A TREASURY OF MINOR BRITISH POETRY. (See page 21.)
- Cook—THE DEFENSE OF POESY, otherwise known as AN APOLOGY FOR POETRY. By Sir PHILIP SIDNEY. Edited by A. S. COOK, Professor of English Literature in Yale University. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.
- Cook—A DEFENCE OF POETRY. By PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY. Edited, with notes and introduction, by Professor A. S. COOK. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Davidson—A HANDBOOK TO DANTE. By GIOVANNI A. SCAR-TAZZINI. Translated from the Italian, with notes and additions, by THOMAS DAVIDSON, M.A. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Ellacombe—THE PLANT-LORE AND GARDEN-CRAFT OF SHAKESPEARE. (See page 22.)
- Fleming—THE ART OF READING AND SPEAKING. By the Rev. Canon FLEMING, Vicar of St. Michael's, Chester Square. Third edition. Cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Garnett—SELECTIONS IN ENGLISH PROSE FROM ELIZABETH TO VICTORIA. Chosen and arranged by JAMES M. GARNETT, M.A., LL.D. 700 pages, large crown 8vo., cloth, 7s. 6d.
- Goschen—THE CULTIVATION AND USE OF IMAGINATION. By the Right Hon. GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- GREAT PUBLIC SCHOOLS. ETON — HARROW — WINCHESTER — RUGBY — WESTMINSTER — MARLBOROUGH — CHELTENHAM — HAILEYBURY — CLIFTON — CHARTERHOUSE. With nearly 100 Illustrations by the best artists. Cheaper edition. One vol., large imperial 16mo., handsomely bound, 3s. 6d.
- Gummere—OLD ENGLISH BALLADS. Selected and Edited by FRANCIS B. GUMMERE, Professor of English in Haverford College, U.S.A. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s. 6d.

- Harrison—STUDIES IN EARLY VICTORIAN LITERATURE. By FREDERIC HARRISON, M.A., Author of 'The Choice of Books,' etc. New and Cheaper Edition, large crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Hartshorne—OLD ENGLISH GLASSES. (See page 1.)
- Herschell—THE BEGGARS OF PARIS. (See page 22.)
- Hole—ADDRESSES TO WORKING MEN FROM PULPIT AND PLATFORM. By the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE, Dean of Rochester. One vol., crown 8vo., 6s.
- Hudson—THE LIFE, ART, AND CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE. By HENRY N. HUDSON, LL.D., Editor of The Harvard Shakespeare, etc. 969 pages, in two vols., large crown 8vo., cloth, 21s.
- Hudson—THE HARVARD EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE'S COMPLETE WORKS. A fine Library Edition. By HENRY N. HUDSON, LL.D., Author of 'The Life, Art, and Characters of Shakespeare.' In twenty volumes, large crown 8vo., cloth, £6. Also in ten volumes, £5.
- Hunt—Leigh Hunt's 'WHAT IS POETRY?' An Answer to the Question, 'What is Poetry?' including Remarks on Versification. By LEIGH HUNT. Edited, with notes, by Professor A. S. COOK. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Lang—LAMB'S ADVENTURES OF ULYSSES. With an Introduction by ANDREW LANG. Square 8vo., cloth, 1s. 6d. Also the Prize Edition, gilt edges, 2s.
- Maud—WAGNER'S HEROES. Parsifal—Tannhauser—Lohengrin—Hans Sachs. By CONSTANCE MAUD. Illustrated by H. GRANVILLE FELL. Second Edition, crown 8vo., 5s.
- Maud—WAGNER'S HEROINES. (See page 22.)
- Morrison—LIFE'S PRESCRIPTION, In Seven Doses. By D. MACLAREN MORRISON. Crown 8vo., parchment, 1s. 6d.
- Raleigh—STYLE. (See page 4.)
- Rodd—FEDA, and other Poems, chiefly Lyrical. By RENNELL RODD, C.M.G. With etched Frontispiece. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Rodd—THE UNKNOWN MADONNA, and other Poems. By RENNELL RODD, C.M.G. With Frontispiece by RICHMOND. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
- Rodd—THE VIOLET CROWN, AND SONGS OF ENGLAND. By RENNELL RODD, C.M.G. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
- Rodd—THE CUSTOMS AND LORE OF MODERN GREECE. By RENNELL RODD, C.M.G. With 7 full-page Illustrations. 8vo., cloth, 8s. 6d.
- Rodd—BALLADS OF THE FLEET. (See page 5.)
- Schelling—A BOOK OF ELIZABETHAN LYRICS. Selected and Edited by F. E. SCHELLING, Professor of English Literature in the University of Pennsylvania. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s. 6d.
- Schelling—BEN JONSON'S TIMBER. Edited by Professor F. E. SCHELLING. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s.
- Sichel—THE STORY OF TWO SALONS. Madame de Beaumont and the Suard. By EDITH SICHEL, Author of 'Worthington Junior.' With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo., cloth, 10s. 6d.
- Thayer—THE BEST ELIZABETHAN PLAYS. Edited, with an Introduction, by WILLIAM R. THAYER. 612 pages, large crown 8vo., cloth, 7s. 6d.
- WINCHESTER COLLEGE. Illustrated by HERBERT MARSHALL. With Contributions in Prose and Verse by OLD WYKEHAMISTS. Demy 4to., cloth, 25s. net. A few copies of the first edition, limited to 1,000 copies, are still to be had.

Works of History and Biography.

- Benson and Tatham—MEN OF MIGHT. Studies of Great Characters. By A. C. BENSON, M.A., and H. F. W. TATHAM, M.A., Assistant Masters at Eton College. Second Edition. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Boyle—THE RECOLLECTIONS OF THE DEAN OF SALISBURY. By the Very Rev. G. D. BOYLE, Dean of Salisbury. With Photogravure Portrait. 1 vol., demy 8vo., cloth, 16s.
- Cawston and Keane—THE EARLY CHARTERED COMPANIES. A.D. 1296-1858. By GEORGE CAWSTON, barrister-at-law, and A. H. KEANE, F.R.G.S. Large crown 8vo., with Frontispiece, 10s. 6d.
- Clough—MEMOIRS OF ANNE CLOUGH. (See page 3.)
- De Vere—RECOLLECTIONS OF AUBREY DE VERE. (See page 2.)
- Fowler—ECHOES OF OLD COUNTY LIFE. By J. K. FOWLER, of Aylesbury. Second Edition, with numerous Illustrations, 8vo., 10s. 6d. Also a Large-paper edition, of 200 copies only, 21s. net.
- Gardner—ROME : THE MIDDLE OF THE WORLD. (See page 4.)
- Gardner—FRIENDS OF THE OLDEN TIME. (See page 28.)
- Hare—MARIA EDGEWORTH : her Life and Letters. Edited by AUGUSTUS J. C. HARE, Author of 'The Story of Two Noble Lives,' etc. Two vols., crown 8vo., with Portraits, 16s. net.
- Hole—THE MEMORIES OF DEAN HOLE. By the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE, Dean of Rochester. With the original Illustrations from sketches by LEECH and THACKERAY. Twelfth thousand, crown 8vo., 6s.
- Hole—MORE MEMORIES : Being Thoughts about England Spoken in America. By the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE, Dean of Rochester. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo., 16s.
- Kay—OMARAH'S HISTORY OF YAMAN. The Arabic Text, edited, with a translation, by HENRY CASSELS KAY, Member of the Royal Asiatic Society. Demy 8vo., cloth, 17s. 6d. net.
- Lecky—THE POLITICAL VALUE OF HISTORY. By W. E. H. LECKY, D.C.L., LL.D. An Address delivered at the Midland Institute, reprinted with additions. Crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Le Fanu—SEVENTY YEARS OF IRISH LIFE. By the late W. R. LE FANU. New and Popular Edition. Crown 8vo., 6s.
- Macdonald—THE MEMOIRS OF THE LATE SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, G.C.B., First Prime Minister of Canada. Edited by JOSEPH POPE, his Private Secretary. With Portraits. Two vols., demy 8vo., 32s.
- Milner—ENGLAND IN EGYPT. By Sir ALFRED MILNER, K.C.B., Governor of Cape Colony and High Commissioner to South Africa. Popular Edition, with Map, and full details of the British position and responsibilities, 7s. 6d.

- Milner—ARNOLD TOYNBEE. A Reminiscence. By Sir ALFRED MILNER, K.C.B., Author of 'England in Egypt.' Crown 8vo., paper, 1s.
- Oman—A HISTORY OF ENGLAND. By CHARLES OMAN, Fellow of All Souls' College, and Lecturer in History at New College, Oxford; Author of 'Warwick the Kingmaker,' 'A History of Greece,' etc. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s. Also in two parts, 3s. each. Part I., to A.D. 1603; Part II., from 1603 to present time.
- Pilkington—IN AN ETON PLAYING FIELD. The Adventures of some old Public School Boys in East London. By E. M. S. PILKINGTON. Fcap. 8vo., handsomely bound, 2s. 6d.
- Pulitzer—THE ROMANCE OF PRINCE EUGENE. An Idyll under Napoleon the First. By ALBERT PULITZER. With numerous Photogravure Illustrations. Two vols., demy 8vo., 21s.
- Raleigh—ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. By WALTER RALEIGH, Professor of English Literature at Liverpool University College. Second edition. Crown 8vo., cloth 2s. 6d.
- Ransome—THE BATTLES OF FREDERICK THE GREAT. Extracted from Carlyle's 'History of Frederick the Great,' and edited by CYRIL RANSOME, M.A., Professor of History at the Yorkshire College, Leeds. With numerous Illustrations by ADOLPH MENZEL. Square 8vo., 3s. 6d.
- Rochefort—THE ADVENTURES OF MY LIFE. By HENRI ROCHEFORT. Second Edition. Two vols., large crown 8vo., 25s.
- Roebuck—AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND LETTERS. (See page 2.)
- Santley—STUDENT AND SINGER. The Reminiscences of CHARLES SANTLEY. New Edition. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Sherard—ALPHONSE DAUDET: a Biography and Critical Study. By R. H. SHERARD, Editor of 'The Memoirs of Baron Meneval,' etc. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 15s.
- Tollemache—BENJAMIN JOWETT, Master of Balliol. A Personal Memoir. By the Hon. LIONEL TOLLEMACHE, Author of 'Safe Studies,' etc. Third Edition, with portrait. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
- Twining—RECOLLECTIONS OF LIFE AND WORK. Being the Autobiography of LOUISA TWINING. One vol., 8vo., cloth, 15s.

Practical Science Manuals.

GENERAL EDITOR: PROFESSOR RAPHAEL MELDOLA, F.R.S.

- STEAM BOILERS. By GEORGE HALLIDAY, late Demonstrator at the Finsbury Technical College. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations. Crown 8vo., 400 pages, 5s. [Ready.]
- AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY. By T. S. DYMOND, of the County Technical Laboratory, Chelmsford. [In preparation.]
- ELECTRIC TRACTION. By ERNEST WILSON, Wh. Sc., M.I.E.E., Lecturer and Demonstrator in the Siemen's Laboratory, King's College, London. [In preparation.]

Works upon Country Life and Pastimes.

- Brown—PLEASURABLE POULTRY-KEEPING. By E. BROWN, F.L.S. Fully illustrated. One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Brown—POULTRY-KEEPING AS AN INDUSTRY FOR FARMERS AND COTTAGERS. By EDWARD BROWN. Fully illustrated. Second edition. Demy 4to., cloth, 6s.
- Brown—INDUSTRIAL POULTRY-KEEPING. By EDWARD BROWN. Illustrated. Paper boards, 1s. A small handbook chiefly intended for cottagers and allotment-holders.
- Brown—POULTRY FATTENING. By E. BROWN, F.L.S. Fully illustrated. New Edition. Crown 8vo., 1s. 6d.
- Clouston.—EARLY ENGLISH FURNITURE. (See page 5.)
- Cunningham—THE DRAUGHTS POCKET MANUAL. By J. G. CUNNINGHAM. An Introduction to the Game in all its branches. Small 8vo., with numerous diagrams, 2s. 6d.
- Ellacombe—IN A GLOUCESTERSHIRE GARDEN. By the Rev. H. N. ELLACOMBE, Vicar of Bitton, and Honorary Canon of Bristol. Author of 'Plant Lore and Garden Craft of Shakespeare.' With new illustrations by Major E. B. RICKETTS. Second Edition. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- Gossip—THE CHESS POCKET MANUAL. By G. H. D. GOSSIP. A Pocket Guide, with numerous Specimen Games and Illustrations. Small 8vo., 2s. 6d.
- Hartshorne—OLD ENGLISH GLASSES. (See page 1.)
- Hole—A BOOK ABOUT THE GARDEN AND THE GARDENER. By the Very Rev. S. REYNOLDS HOLE, Dean of Rochester. Second edition. Crown 8vo., 6s.
- Hole—A BOOK ABOUT ROSES. (See page 21.)
- Holt—FANCY DRESSES DESCRIBED. By ARDERN HOLT. An Alphabetical Dictionary of Fancy Costumes. With full accounts of the Dresses. About 60 Illustrations by LILLIAN YOUNG. Many of them coloured. One vol., demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.
- Kenney - Herbert — FIFTY BREAKFASTS: containing a great variety of New and Simple Recipes for Breakfast Dishes. By Colonel KENNEY-HERBERT ('Wyvern'). Small 8vo., 2s. 6d.
- Kenney - Herbert — FIFTY DINNERS. By Colonel KENNEY-HERBERT. Small 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Kenney - Herbert — FIFTY LUNCHEs. By Colonel KENNEY-HERBERT. Small 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- Kenney-Herbert—FIFTY SUPPERS. (See page 4.)
- Kenney - Herbert — COMMON-SENSE COOKERY: based on Modern English and Continental Principles, Worked out in Detail. By Colonel A. KENNEY-HERBERT ('Wyvern'). Large crown 8vo., over 500 pp., 7s. 6d.
- Shorland—CYCLING FOR HEALTH AND PLEASURE. By L. H. PORTER, Author of 'Wheels and Wheeling,' etc. Revised and edited by F. W. SHORLAND, Amateur Champion 1892-93-94. With numerous Illustrations, small 8vo., 2s. 6d.
- White—PLEASURABLE BEE-KEEPING. By C. N. WHITE, Lecturer to the County Councils of Huntingdon, Cambridgeshire, etc. Fully illustrated. One vol., crown 8vo., cloth, 2s. 6d.
- WILD FLOWERS IN ART AND NATURE. By J. C. L. SPARKES, Principal of the National Art Training School, South Kensington, and F. W. BURBIDGE, Curator of the University Botanical Gardens, Dublin. With 21 Full-page Coloured Plates by H. G. MOON. Royal 4to., handsomely bound, gilt edges, 21s.

Books for the Young.

FIVE SHILLINGS EACH.

- SNOW-SHOES AND SLEDGES. By KIRK MUNROE. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
RICK DALE. By KIRK MUNROE. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
ERIC THE ARCHER. By MAURICE H. HERVEY. With numerous full-page Illustrations. Handsomely bound, crown 8vo., 5s.
THE FUR SEAL'S TOOTH. By KIRK MUNROE. Fully illustrated. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
HOW DICK AND MOLLY WENT ROUND THE WORLD. By M. H. CORNWALL LEGH. With numerous Illustrations. Foolscap 4to., cloth, 5s.
HOW DICK AND MOLLY SAW ENGLAND. By M. H. CORNWALL LEGH. With numerous Illustrations. Foolscap 4to., 5s.
DR. GILBERT'S DAUGHTERS. By MARGARET HARRIET MATHEWS. Illustrated by CHRIS. HAMMOND. Crown 8vo., cloth, 5s.
THE REEF OF GOLD. By MAURICE H. HERVEY. With numerous full-page Illustrations, handsomely bound. Gilt edges, 5s.
BAREROCK; or, The Island of Pearls. By HENRY NASH. With numerous Illustrations by LANCELOT SPEED. Large crown 8vo., handsomely bound, gilt edges, 5s.

THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE EACH.

- TALES FROM HANS ANDERSEN. With nearly 40 Original Illustrations by E. A. LEMANN. Small 4to., handsomely bound in cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE SNOW QUEEN, and other Tales. By HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN. Beautifully illustrated by Miss E. A. LEMANN. Small 4to., handsomely bound, 3s. 6d.
HUNTERS THREE. By THOMAS W. KNOX, Author of 'The Boy Travellers,' etc. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE SECRET OF THE DESERT. By E. D. FAWCETT. With numerous full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
JOEL: A BOY OF GALILEE. By ANNIE FELLOWS JOHNSTON. With ten full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE MUSHROOM CAVE. By EVELYN RAYMOND. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE DOUBLE EMPEROR. By W. LAIRD CLOWES, Author of 'The Great Peril,' etc. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.
SWALLOWED BY AN EARTHQUAKE. By E. D. FAWCETT. Illustrated. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d.
HARTMANN THE ANARCHIST; or, The Doom of the Great City. By E. DJUGLAS FAWCETT. With sixteen full-page and numerous smaller Illustrations by F. T. JANE. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.
ANIMAL SKETCHES: a Popular Book of Natural History. By Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, F.G.S. Crown 8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

TWO SHILLINGS EACH.

- THE CHILDREN'S FAVOURITE SERIES. A Charming Series of Juvenile Books, each plentifully Illustrated, and written in simple language to please young readers. Price 2s. each; or, gilt edges, 2s. 6d.

My Book of Wonders.
 My Book of Travel Stories.
 My Book of Adventures.
 My Book of the Sea.
 My Book of Fables.
 Deeds of Gold.
 My Book of Heroism.

My Book of Perils.
 My Book of Fairy Tales.
 My Book of History Tales.
 My Story Book of Animals.
 Rhymes for You and Me.
 My Book of Inventions.

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH.

The Children's Hour Series.

All with Full-page Illustrations.

- THE PALACE ON THE MOOR. By E. DAVENPORT ADAMS. 1s. 6d.
TOBY'S PROMISE. By A. M. HOPKINSON. 1s. 6d.
MASTER MAGNUS. By Mrs. E. M. Field. 1s. 6d.
MY DOG PLATO. By M. H. CORNWALL LEGH. 1s. 6d.
FRIENDS OF THE OLDEN TIME. By ALICE GARDNER, Lecturer in History at Newnham College, Cambridge. Second Edition. Illustrated. Square 8vo., 2s. 6d.

THE INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION SERIES.

- THE INTELLECTUAL AND MORAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE CHILD. By GABRIEL CAMPAYRE. 6s.
- TEACHING THE LANGUAGE-ARTS. Speech, Reading, Composition. By B. A. HINSDALE, Ph.D., LL.D., University of Michigan. 4s. 6d.
- THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE NUMBER, AND ITS APPLICATION TO METHODS OF TEACHING ARITHMETIC. By JAMES A. McLELLAN, A.M., and JOHN DEWEY, Ph.D. 6s.
- THE SONGS AND MUSIC OF FROEBEL'S MOTHER PLAY. By SUSAN E. BLOW. 6s.
- THE MOTTOES AND COMMENTARIES OF FROEBEL'S MOTHER PLAY. By SUSAN E. BLOW and H. R. ELIOT. 6s.
- HOW TO STUDY AND TEACH HISTORY. By B. A. HINSDALE, Ph.D., LL.D. 6s.
- FROEBEL'S PEDAGOGICS OF THE KINDERGARTEN; or, His Ideas concerning the Play and Playthings of the Child. Translated by J. JARVIS. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- THE EDUCATION OF THE GREEK PEOPLE, AND ITS INFLUENCE ON CIVILIZATION. By THOMAS DAVIDSON. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- SYSTEMATIC SCIENCE TEACHING. By EDWARD G. HOWE. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- EVOLUTION OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM IN MASSACHUSETTS. By GEORGE H. MARTIN. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- THE INFANT MIND; or, Mental Development in the Child. Translated from the German of W. PREYER, Professor of Physiology in the University of Jena. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.
- ENGLISH EDUCATION IN THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS. By ISAAC SHARPLESS, LL.D., President of Haverford College, U.S.A. Crown 8vo., cloth, 4s. 6d.
- EMILE; or, A Treatise on Education. By JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU. Translated and Edited by W. H. PAYNE, Ph.D., LL.D., President of the Peabody Normal College, U.S.A. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- EDUCATION FROM A NATIONAL STANDPOINT. Translated from the French of ALFRED FOULLÉE by W. J. GREENSTREET, M.A., Head Master of the Marling School, Stroud. Crown 8vo., cloth, 7s. 6d.
- THE MORAL INSTRUCTION OF CHILDREN. By FELIX ADLER, President of the Ethical Society of New York. Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- THE PHILOSOPHY OF EDUCATION. By JOHANN KARL ROSENKRANZ, Doctor of Theology and Professor of Philosophy at Königsberg. (Translated.) Crown 8vo., cloth, 6s.
- A HISTORY OF EDUCATION. By Professor F. V. N. PAINTER. 6s.
- THE VENTILATION AND WARMING OF SCHOOL BUILDINGS. With Plans and Diagrams. By GILBERT B. MORRISON. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d.
- FROEBEL'S 'EDUCATION OF MAN.' Translated by W. N. HAILMAN. Crown 8vo., 6s.
- ELEMENTARY PSYCHOLOGY AND EDUCATION. By Dr. J. BALDWIN. Illustrated, crown 8vo., 6s.
- THE SENSES AND THE WILL. Forming Part I. of 'The Mind of the Child.' By W. PREYER, Professor of Physiology in the University of Jena. (Translated.) Crown 8vo., 6s.
- THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE INTELLECT. Forming Part II. of 'The Mind of the Child.' By Professor W. PREYER. (Translated.) Crown 8vo., 6s.
- HOW TO STUDY GEOGRAPHY. By FRANCIS W. PARKER. 6s.
- A HISTORY OF EDUCATION IN THE UNITED STATES. By RICHARD A. BOONE, Professor of Pedagogy in Indiana University. Crown 8vo., 6s.
- EUROPEAN SCHOOLS; or, What I Saw in the Schools of Germany, France, Austria, and Switzerland. By L. R. KLEMM, Ph.D. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo., 8s. 6d.
- PRACTICAL HINTS FOR TEACHERS. By GEORGE HOWLAND, Superintendent of the Chicago Schools. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d.
- SCHOOL SUPERVISION. By J. L. PICKARD. 4s. 6d.
- HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN IN EUROPE. By HELENE LANGE. 4s. 6d.
- HERBART'S TEXT-BOOK IN PSYCHOLOGY. By M. K. SMITH. 4s. 6d.
- PSYCHOLOGY APPLIED TO THE ART OF TEACHING. By Dr. J. BALDWIN. 6s.
- THE SCHOOL SYSTEM OF ONTARIO. By the Hon. GEORGE W. ROSS, LL.D. 4s. 6d.
- FROEBEL'S EDUCATIONAL LAWS FOR ALL TEACHERS. By JAMES L. HUGHES. 6s.
- SCHOOL MANAGEMENT AND SCHOOL METHODS. By Dr. J. BALDWIN. 6s.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

Edited by L. J. MAXSE.

Price Half-a-crown Monthly.

The 'National Review' is the leading Unionist and Conservative Review in Great Britain. Since it passed into the control and editorship of Mr. Leo Maxse, most of the leaders of the Unionist Party have contributed to its pages, including the Marquis of Salisbury, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. J. Chamberlain, and Lord George Hamilton. The episodes of the month, which give a masterly review of the important events of the preceding month, form a valuable feature of the Review, which now occupies a unique position among monthly periodicals.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE INDIA OFFICE AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

Mr. EDWARD ARNOLD, having been appointed Publisher to the Secretary of State for India in Council, has now on sale the above publications at 37 Bedford Street, Strand, and is prepared to supply full information concerning them on application.

INDIAN GOVERNMENT MAPS.

Any of the Maps in this magnificent series can now be obtained at the shortest notice from Mr. EDWARD ARNOLD, Publisher to the India Office.

The following Catalogues of Mr. Edward Arnold's Publications will be sent post free on application :

CATALOGUE OF WORKS OF GENERAL LITERATURE.

GENERAL CATALOGUE OF EDUCATIONAL WORKS, including the principal publications of Messrs. Ginn and Company, Educational Publishers, of Boston and New York, and of Messrs. E. L. Kellogg and Company, of New York.

CATALOGUE OF WORKS FOR USE IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS. With Specimen Pages.

ILLUSTRATED LIST OF BOOKS FOR PRESENTS AND PRIZES.

Index to Authors.

	PAGE		PAGE
ADAMS.—The Palace on the Moor . . .	28	DE VERE.—Recollections	2
ADDERLEY.—Stephen Remarx	16	DUNMORE.—Ormsdal	16
" Paul Mercer	8	ELLACOMBE. — In a Gloucestershire
AGLEN.—Old Testament History	6	Garden	27
ALDRICH.—Arctic Alaska	14	ELLACOMBE.—The Plant Lore of Shake-
AMERICAN GAME FISHES	14	speare	27
BACON.—City of Blood	3	FAWCETT.—Hartmann the Anarchist	28
BALFOUR.—Twelve Hundred Miles in a		" Riddle of the Universe	20
Waggon	13	" Secret of the Desert	28
BELL, MRS.—Kleines Haustheater	23	" Swallowed by an Earthquake	28
BELL (REV. CANON).—The Gospel the		FIELD.—Master Magnus	28
Power of God	22	FLEMING.—Art of Reading and Speaking	23
" Sermons	23	FORD.—On the Threshold	16
" Diana's Looking Glass	23	FOWLER.—Echoes of Old County Life	25
" Poems Old and New	23	FRESHFIELD.—Exploration of the Cau-
BENSON.—Men of Might	25	casus	13
BERKELEY.—Reminiscences of a Hunts-		GARDNER.—Friends of Olden Time	28
man	9	" Rome: Middle of World	5
BEYNON.—With Kelly to Chitral	13	GARNETT.—Selections in English Prose	23
BLATCHFORD.—Tommy Atkins	16	GAUNT.—Dave's Sweetheart	16
BOTTOME.—A Sunshine Trip	13	GLEICHEN.—With the British Mission to
BOYLE.—Recollections of the Dean of		Menelik	4
Salisbury	25	GORDON.—Persia Revisited	13
BROWN.—Works on Poultry Keeping	27	GOSCHEN.—Cultivation and Use of the
BRYAN.—Mark in Europe	20	Imagination	23
BULL.—The Cruise of the 'Antarctic'	13	GOSSIP.—Chess Pocket Manual	27
BURBIDGE.—Wild Flowers in Art	27	GREAT PUBLIC SCHOOLS	23
BURGESS.—Political Science	20	GUMMERE.—Old English Ballads	23
BUTLER.—Select Essays of Sainte Beuve	23	HADJIRA	16
CRAWSON.—The Early Chartered Com-		HALL.—Fish Tails	12
panies	25	HANS ANDERSEN.—Snow Queen	28
CHAPMAN.—Wild Norway	11	" Tales from	28
CHARLETON.—Netherdyke	8	HARE.—Life and Letters of Maria Edge-
CHERBULIEZ.—The Tutor's Secret	16	worth	25
CHILDREN'S FAVOURITE SERIES	28	HARRISON.—Early Victorian Literature	24
CHILDREN'S HOUR SERIES	28	HARTSHORNE.—Old English Glasses	1
CHOLMONDELEY.—A Devotee	15	HERSCHELL.—Parisian Beggars	22
CLIFFORD.—Love-Letters	16	HERVEY.—Eric the Archer	28
CLOUGH.—Memoir of Anne J. Clough	3	" Reef of Gold	28
CLOUSTON.—Early English Furniture	6	HIGGINS.—New Guide to the Pacific
CLOWES.—Double Emperor	28	Coast	14
COLERIDGE.—King with Two Faces	8	HOLE.—Addresses to Working Men	24
COLLINGWOOD.—Thorstein	23	" Book about Roses	21
" The Bondwoman	16	" Book about the Garden	27
COLLINS.—A Treasury of Minor British		" Little Tour in America	13
Poetry	21	" Little Tour in Ireland	13
COLVILLE.—Land of the Nile Springs	13	" Memories	25
COOK.—Sidney's Defense of Poesy	23	" More Memories	25
" Shelley's Defence of Poetry	23	HOLT.—Fancy Dresses Described	27
COSMOPOLITE.—Sportsman in Ireland	10	HOPKINSON.—Toby's Promise	28
CRANE.—George's Mother	16	HOPKINS.—Religions of India	18
CUNNINGHAM.—Draughts Manual	27	HUDSON.—Life, Art, and Characters of
CUSTANCE.—Riding Recollections	13	Shakespeare	24
DAVIDSON.—Handbook to Dante	23	" Harvard Shakespeare	24
		HUNT.—What is Poetry?	24

	PAGE		PAGE
HUTCHINSON.—That Fiddler Fellow	16	OXENDEN.—Interludes	15
INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION SERIES	29	PAGET.—Wasted Records of Disease	16
JOHNSTON.—Joel ; a Boy of Galilee	28	PEARSON.—The Chances of Death	1
KAY.—Omarah's Yaman	25	PERRY.—Calculus for Engineers	19
KENNEY-HERBERT.—Fifty Breakfasts	27	PHILOSOPHICAL REVIEW	20
" " Fifty Dinners	27	PIKE.—Through the Sub-Arctic Forest	14
" " Fifty Lunches	27	PILKINGTON.—An Eton Playing-Field	26
" " Fifty Suppers	5	PINSENT.—Job Hildred	8
" " Common-sense	5	POLLOCK.—Fifty Years' Reminiscences of India	14
Cookery	27	POPE.—Memoirs of Sir John Macdonald	25
KNIGHT-BRUCE.—Memories of Mashona- land	13	PORTAL.—British Mission to Uganda	14
KNOX.—Hunters Three	28	" My Mission to Abyssinia	14
KNUTSFORD.—Mystery of the Rue Soly	17	PRACTICAL SCIENCE MANUALS	26
KUHNS.—The Treatment of Nature in Dante	21	PRESCOTT.—A Mask and a Martyr	17
LANG.—Lamb's Adventures of Ulysses	24	PULITZER.—Romance of Prince Eugene	26
LEADER.—Autobiography of Roebuck	2	RALEIGH.—Robert Louis Stevenson	26
LECKY.—Political Value of History	25	" Style	5
LE FANU.—Seventy Years of Irish Life	25	RANSOME.—Battles of Frederick the Great	26
LEFFINGWELL.—Art of Wing-Shooting	14	RAYMOND.—Mushroom Cave	28
LEGH.—How Dick and Molly went round the World	28	ROCHFORD.—The Adventures of My Life	26
LEGH.—How Dick and Molly saw Eng- land	28	RODD.—Ballads of the Fleet	6
LEGH.—My Dog Plato	28	RODD.—Works by Rennell Rodd	24
LOTZE.—Philosophical Outlines	20	ROEBUCK.—Autobiography	2
MACDONALD.—Memoirs of Sir John Macdonald	25	SANTLEY.—Student and Singer	26
MACDONALD.—Soldiering and Surveying in British East Africa	12	SCHELLING.—Elizabethan Lyrics	24
MAUD.—Wagner's Heroes	24	" Ben Jonson's Timber	24
" Wagner's Heroines	22	SCROPE.—Art of Deer-Stalking	9
MAXWELL.—The Sportsman's Library	10	SHAW.—A Text Book of Nursing	18
" Memories of the Months	12	SHERARD.—Alphonse Daudet	26
MCNAB.—On Veidt and Farm	11	SHIELDS.—Camping and Camp Outfits	14
MCNULTY.—Misther O'Ryan	17	SHIELDS.—American Book of the Dog	14
" Son of a Peasant	8	SHORLAND.—Cycling for Health and Pleasure	27
MILNER.—England in Egypt	25	SICHEL.—The Story of Two Salons	24
" Arnold Toynbee	26	SIMPSON.—Many Memories of Many People	4
MONTRÉSOR.—Worth While	17	SLATIN.—Fire and Sword in the Sudan	7
More Beasts for Worse Children	7	SMITH.—The Life of a Fox	10
MORGAN.—Animal Life	20	" Through Unknown African Countries	11
" Habit and Instinct	19	SPINNER.—A Reluctant Evangelist	15
" Psychology for Teachers	20	STONE.—In and Beyond the Himalayas	14
" Springs of Conduct	20	TATHAM.—Men of Might	25
MORPHOLOGY, JOURNAL OF	20	THAYER.—Best Elizabethan Plays	24
MORRISON.—Life's Prescription	24	THOMAS.—Sweden and the Swedes	14
MUNROE.—Fur Seal's Tooth	28	THORNTON.—A Sporting Tour	10
" Rick Dale	28	TOLLEMACHE.—Benjamin Jowett	26
" Snow-shoes and Sledges	28	TWINING.—Recollections of Life and Work	26
NASH.—Barerock	28	WHITE.—Pleasurable Bee-Keeping	27
NATIONAL REVIEW	30	WILD FLOWERS IN ART AND NATURE	27
OMAN.—History of England	26	WILLIAMS.—The Bayonet that came Home	15
		WINCHESTER COLLEGE	24
		YOUNG.—General Astronomy	20

University of California
SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY Return this material to the library from which it was borrowed.

10/10/88

REC'D LD-URL

OCT 07 1988

REC'D LD-URL
OCT 02 1989

QL

AUG 29 1990

REC'D LD-URL
JAN 22 1991

QL

JUN 29 1991

REC'D YRL

QL OCT 07 1991

REC'D LD-URL

QL JAN 21 1993

NOV 23 1994

DUE 2 WKS FROM DATE RECEIVED

ILC-CLB

MAY 06 2003

UCLA YRL/ILL

NON-RENEWABLE

JUN 14 2003

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

A 000 084 439 9

University of Southern R
Library F